Methodist Church At Vass Pays Debt On New Building

Announcement was made last Sunday that the Vass Methodist Church has paid in full for its new educational building and furnishings, an amount of approximately $24,000. The final $2400 was derived from the Duke Endowment Fund, but the church was required to pay its part before the 10 per cent would be available.

The building, which adds four classrooms, one of which is larger than the others for use as an assembly room for the young people, a kitchen, large fellowship hall and rest rooms, was started on March 23, 1955, and first occupied September 11 of the same year, slightly under six months later. It is of brick and cement block construction.

The kitchen is equipped with electric range, water heater and refrigerator and plenty of dishes and cutlery for present needs; there is an electric water fountain which was a gift from the Men of the Church. An additional piano, cabinets, and some chairs, were purchased, and all of the old classrooms were repainted.

The Rev. Walter C. Smith, Jr., now of Greenbelt, Md., but at the time the building was started a Duke University student serving as pastor of the church, is given much credit for getting the building program organized. A two-year plan for payment was worked out, and the congregation has completed payment before the time set.

At the recent quarterly conference the church voted to have a full-time minister the coming year, so living quarters will have to be provided. It was requested Sunday that payments for this be made for a while, just as building fund payments have in the past, in order to meet this new need. For several years the church has been served by Duke students, the present pastor being the Rev. James Eskridge. Plans for formal dedication of the new building are being discussed, but no date for the dedication has been set.
