

OCTOBER POPULAR

Sky-driving through Eastern America's highest mountains in autumn foliage time, fishing and hunting from coast to mountains, and the beginning of the winter season in the Mid-South resorts make October one of North Carolina's most popular travel months.

THEATRES SUNRISE

Sinclair Lewis started a giant-size controversy in 1927 with the opening line of his argumentative novel, "Elmer Gantry was drunk."

As depicted by Sinclair Lewis, Gantry was shrewd and naive; handsome and coarse; calculating and opportunistic; idealistic and cynical; capable of great love and equally great debauchery, and above all, a man of great ambition. The novel is uninhibited in its study of Gantry's personal life and private morals.

As a fictional phenomenon, Gantry seemed too real when he burst upon the American public. The book was one of the first to be banned in Boston.

Personal vindication for Lewis came after the publication of "Elmer Gantry," when the Prize Committee in Stockholm awarded Sinclair Lewis the first Nobel Prize for literature ever to go to an American.

But the arguments—and the book sales—have continued through the years.

Filming of "Elmer Gantry," which will be seen at The Sunrise Theatre Sunday through Wednesday of next week, was considered a private affair from beginning to end. It was a "closed set" throughout shooting and all visitors were carefully screened. Precautions were taken in deference to the admittedly controversial nature of the subject matter. Producer Bernard Smith declared at the outset that "there is nothing in this picture that a reasonable person—either layman or minister—will object to."

But he joined with Director-Scenarist Richard Brooks and star Burt Lancaster in insisting that "Elmer Gantry" be judged in its entirety when completed—and not before then.
