GOVERNOR SUMS UP WORK. LOOKS TO FUTURE

Education: Mandate Of The People

In a recent speech, Gov. Terry Sanford summed up his administration's achievements in the field of education and expressed confidence that the state's people want to continue "to seek the best for our children" in years to come. Following are excerpts from that address:

In recent years North Carolinians have made our State a national pacesetter in improving educational opportunities.

This campaign for better educational opportunities for all the children of North Carolina has extended from the first grade of the public schools to the doctoral programs of the graduate schools. It has included the greatest advance for public education in the history of our State and the greatest advance throughout the United States.

It has included the Higher Education Act, adopted by the 1963 General Assembly, which has been termed the greatest step forward in higher education in North Carolina since the consolidation of the University in 1931.

This campaign for better education is building comprehensive community colleges as and where needed across North Carolina.

The campaign has upgraded the three campuses of the University.

This campaign is erecting three new senior colleges—one in the East at Wilmington, one in the Piedmont at Charlotte, and one in the mountains at Asheville.

Special Problems
This campaign also has featured special attacks on special problems and special opportunities.

We began operation in the summer of 1963 of the Governor's School for exceptionally talented children.

We have greatly accelerated the special classes within the public schools for talented children.

At the other end of the scale, we have greatly accelerated support for special training for the mentally retarded.

We are working on plans for a residence school for illiterates.

We already have underway Operation Second Chance to give youth—especially farm youth—the opportunity to make up the schooling they missed earlier in their lives.

We have under way plans for the Advancement School at Winston-Salem, where we will give a chance to average and above-average students who for various reasons do not learn in school.

These are some of the highlights of great effort by the citizens of North Carolina who are determined that their children will have a better chance to learn and a better chance to earn.

Only A Start

However, all of these programs are but a start on the broad and lengthy road to make our schools what they should be. North Carolina has made an outstanding start in improving educational opportunities for our sons and daughters.

But we cannot afford to rest on our laurels or put our State or our schools in moth balls.

I want to make a pledge to the people of North Carolina. I pledge to continue my efforts at full speed until the last hour of the day I occupy this office.

You will remember that Governor Hodges made up my first budget for 1961-63. Under the sound procedures we have followed since the days of Governor McLean, it will be my duty, with the help of the Advisory Budget Commission, to make up the budget for 1965-67.

We set out on a program of making our school system for our children the best in the nation. I predicted four years ago that this would take at least ten years. We started on that ten-year program.

To Seek The Best

I think it is the will of the people to continue this program and to seek the best for our children. Of all the resources available in making up the budget, it is my intention to see that the program of education is continued, and that education gets first priority. We will put in budget items to improve the teaching of fundamental subjects in the first three grades, and generally to advance the excellence of education. We cannot quit now. And so the new Governor, whoever he might be, will be presented a budget which carries out this mandate of the people. If this new Governor doesn't believe in improving the opportunities of our children then he will have to ask the Legislature to take these items out of the budget.

Continuing Priority

It is my duty to give continuing priority to education.

We have worked hard for four years. We still have at least six years to go.

Now is not the time to retrench. Now is not the time to draw back.

We have only opened the doors to the educational opportunities that are available to us as citizens and to our children as future citizens.

Charles Brantley Aycock sounded the keynote of courage at the start of this Century. He did so at a time when our State was suffering the economic and the physical ills of Reconstruction. Aycock laid down the battle cry for the opportunities of all to burgeon out the best that was within them.

If North Carolinians have proved anything in their history, they have proved that they have the courage to go out and face the future and to grasp the opportunities of that future.

Up The Ladder

We have made a good start up the education ladder. But we cannot afford to stop half way up that ladder.

There are too many rungs yet to be climbed.

There is too much ignorance yet to be overcome.

There is too much poverty yet to be conquered.

There are too many opportunities yet to be seized.

North Carolinians faced this issue of education when they reopened the University after the Civil War.

North Carolinians faced this issue with Aycock at the start of this Century.

North Carolinians faced this issue when we determined to keep our schools open during the dark days of the Depression.

We faced the issue again in recent years.

And we assuredly face it today.

Confident

North Carolinians have spoken out loud and clear every time this question of education has been put to them. They have had the courage to sacrifice for education. They have had the good sense to invest in education.

I am absolutely confident that North Carolinians intend to keep on improving the schools for our sons and daughters this year, next year and in the years ahead.

Rehabilitation and retraining methods can help restore the stroke patient to useful living, the North Carolina Heart Association says.

Who Is Mr. Mills?

Mr. A. H. Mills of RFD 3, Apex, N. C., and nearly 32,000 other shareholders are owners of CP&L. A retired farmer and merchant, Mr. Mills lives in a home that he built 47 years ago. Like him, almost half of CP&L's shareholders live in the Carolinas. Others live in every state and some foreign countries.

This big group of owners includes folks from a lot of different occupations and professions. For some of them, the investment in CP&L is intended to provide income for retirement or to finance an education for children. Others have different goals.

Whatever their purpose and wherever they live, CP&L owners have much in common. They have put up money to build a business-managed company, risking their savings in the hope of making a profit. They expect their Company to pay its share of taxes / to pay the full cost of money it must borrow / to supply plenty of electricity for the needs of a growing area / to give good service at reasonable prices. In short, to be a good corporate citizen.

As owners of a free enterprise business, they are free to sell their shares anytime they wish at the market price. Or they can buy more shares.

When we say that CP&L is investor-owned, we are talking about folks like Mr. Mills.
