Supt. Lee Sees Russian Schools

Returning last week from a tour of European cities with a "People to People" group of 14 professional and business men from North Carolina, Supt. Robert E. Lee of the Moore County school system reported visits to schools in Brussels, Stockholm, Prague and East Berlin, as well as in Moscow, Leningrad and Kiev, the three largest cities in the Soviet Union.

ROBERT E. LEE

A partial report of the trip, from an interview with Mr. Lee after his return to his Carthage home and his school duties, appeared in last week's Pilot.

Because of the attention directed in recent years to Russian schools, Mr. Lee was questioned especially about his experiences in the Soviet Union. "I was particularly interested in Russia," he said, "but when I got there I realized I already knew more than I realized. Now I am wondering—did what I had read and heard turn out to be true, or did I fit what I saw to my own preconceptions? It's hard to sort out so many impressions received in such a short time, and see just what you knew before, and what you've learned."

Some schools were in old buildings, some in new; one was built with a front like a big city store, with practically no play space; only one that he saw in Russia had a really large playground, yet, though there were superficial differences, "If you've seen one you've seen them all," Lee found. They are operated from the top down, with the Minister of Education the man on top, curriculum, equipment, methods are identical everywhere.

Ahead and Behind In some ways he found them far ahead of our schools, in other ways behind. "Grades one through four are operated with most modern manner—yet with one teacher for all four grades, and she averages 38 pupils—far too many, by our standards. "The fifth through 10th grades are departmentalized, rather like our junior high schools, though the pupils remain in one room the teachers go from one room to another.

"These 10 grades comprise all the work we have in 12, and more. For most pupils, it is all the schooling they have. While some go on to the University, most go to work—this is considered the normal, desirable thing. Many of the workers carry on their education in trade schools, or night courses at the University.

"The teachers are highly superior, well trained and efficient—and there, we have to envy Russia a bit. While salaries are just fair, the government can compete for the best brains in the country. The teacher has status comparable to the highest professional people, and there are numerous other advantages, such as an apartment, for which an ordinary person may have to wait two or three years.

Work Hard "The teachers I talked with laughed at the idea of discipline problems—they just don't have any at all. And it is true—in class the children are so quiet and attentive you can hear a pin drop. They work hard and seriously. But when a break comes, or they go out on the playground, they race about and split your ears screaming."

The study of languages—English, French, German and Dutch—starts in the fifth grade, and in the "English schools" some of the children attend, English starts in the first grade. As most mothers work, the children receive both breakfast and lunch at school. Lee visited one cafeteria while lunch was being prepared and found it "an excellent meal."

Soccer is the big deal in sports. Basketball and tennis played only incidentally, but calisthenics are taken very seriously. In the second period of the school day a ball bang, the children all popped out of their classrooms into the wide hall and there went through their exercises to commands of the instructor given via loud-speaker.

This was in a school at Kiev—large, modern and handsome—which impressed Lee the most and where he spent a whole day, visiting every classroom, talking with all the teachers and many of the students and getting a good look at all the equipment.

Surprised He was surprised that in this fine school of 920 pupils, as in others he visited, there was no central library—only a small "book room" where volumes could be checked out, to be read elsewhere. Also, he said, "they are far behind us in audio-visual equipment," and apparently use no television in the schools. In fact, though he saw TV antennae bristling on apartment house roofs, he saw only one TV during his stay in Russia—a color set on the street, with about 300 people crowded in front of it, watching.

Memories of the Russian schools were of a gracious, friendly reception everywhere; flowers presented to him, with a greeting spoken in English, at the school in Kiev; children in each grade dressed alike, in costumes varying slightly from grade to grade—red pinafores on the girls in one class, blue ones in another; girls with long flowing hair, boys also shaggy-topped; school children wearing shoulder pins showing Lenin progressing through childhood in stages to match their own ages; statues of Lenin everywhere.

"There is so much building going on, to make up for war shortages and destruction—everywhere you see those enormous apartment houses going up. Most of the new schools are incorporated into them along with a shopping center, playground, etc. This was true of all the countries we visited—Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Czechoslovakia, also West Berlin.

Differences "While the schools are surprisingly alike, the standard of living in these countries varied widely, and the cultural and historical backgrounds were so different—you could sense it as soon as you arrived. Coming from Russia into Czechoslovakia, for example, though Czechoslovakia is governmentally a satellite state, is like moving into another world."

"Of course we saw only the cities. Things may be different in the small towns and rural areas. Our tour did not carry us into any of those. We were free to move around as we pleased in the cities we visited, but there was no way for us to get off the beaten path.

"We were shocked and saddened by the deterioration of the churches and the loss of religious faith, not only in Russia but in all the countries where we went. Faith is something which seems to have been left only for a few very old people. "But it was interesting, exciting and heartening to sense everywhere the friendliness of the people, especially of the Russians, who saw our 'People to People' tour badges and came to speak to us everywhere. Usually, in any group, there would be someone who could speak some English. They asked many questions—'Do you own your own home? Do you have a car? How much money do you make?'—and so on. Few of them own cars. Once you get outside of Moscow, you hardly ever see a privately owned vehicle. The people ride buses, or walk—the sidewalks are almost as wide as our streets, and full all the time.

"It is easier to understand the Russian people when you hear them tell, over and over, how far they have had to come since the Revolution, and when you hear them say, 'We are going to catch up—just give us time.' "Nowhere did we meet with any resentment or hostility. Over and over, they told us, 'We want peace.'"

While the schools are surprisingly alike, the standard of living in these countries varied widely, and the cultural and historical backgrounds were so different—you could sense it as soon as you arrived. Coming from Russia into Czechoslovakia, for example, though Czechoslovakia is governmentally a satellite state, is like moving into another world.

Of course we saw only the cities. Things may be different in the small towns and rural areas. Our tour did not carry us into any of those. We were free to move around as we pleased in the cities we visited, but there was no way for us to get off the beaten path.

We were shocked and saddened by the deterioration of the churches and the loss of religious faith, not only in Russia but in all the countries where we went. Faith is something which seems to have been left only for a few very old people.

But it was interesting, exciting and heartening to sense everywhere the friendliness of the people, especially of the Russians, who saw our 'People to People' tour badges and came to speak to us everywhere. Usually, in any group, there would be someone who could speak some English. They asked many questions—'Do you own your own home? Do you have a car? How much money do you make?'—and so on. Few of them own cars. Once you get outside of Moscow, you hardly ever see a privately owned vehicle. The people ride buses, or walk—the sidewalks are almost as wide as our streets, and full all the time.
