Blank Ammunition Danger Explained

Officials of the Army exercise Hawk Blade and Air Assault II to be conducted in the Carolinas October through mid November are advising the civilian populace of possible danger from blank ammunition.

The exercise area includes the Uwharrie National Forest, which extends into the northwestern part of Moore County and where the Cherokee Trail IV Special Warfare maneuver will be conducted simultaneously.

Any explosive device or blank ammunition found in the area should be reported to the local police. Special Army units will then recover these items.

The purpose of these exercises is to determine whether advances in light aircraft capabilities and new technology can be employed to improve the battlefield mobility and combat effectiveness of US ground forces.

"While there will be no live firing during the exercises, numerous types of blank ammunition and explosive devices to include artillery simulators, pyrotechnics and firecrackers will be used," exercise officials said. All troops have been trained to keep close control of such ammunition, but there is always a possibility that some unfired item may not be recovered.

"These items can be particularly dangerous at close range and should be left alone if found. Parents should caution their children not to pick them up."
