Acid phosphate is made by treating

Acid phosphate is widely used because it increases crop yield at a small cost.

The untreated rock gives good results when used in connection with liberal quantities of organic matter PINE WOOD WANTED-TWENTYbut it is not as effective as acid phosphate.

Acid phosphate is effective because it carries readily available phosphorus.

Few, if any, authentic cases are known of acid phosphate injuring

From 200 to 800 pounds of acid phosphate per acre can be used with profit during a rotation of three or four years on most soils.

In general it is better to apply acid phosphate in such a way that it is distributed over the entire area to be

Manure cannot take the place of acid phosphate but, instead, to be most effective, must have acid phosphate applied with it.

Practically all soils that have been farmed for any length of time need acid phosphate.

In a good system of live stock farming, which includes the growing_of legumes in a short rotation and the care and application of manure as well crops can be grown and soil fertility maintained at a high point by the purchase of nothing but acid phosphate.-Indiana Farmer.

Grazing the Pastures Too Close.

Next to weeds and brush, I believe the greatest obstacle to the making of good pastures in the South is too close grazing. I have made this statement before, but it seems to me so vital that further discussion is justified if by so doing its importance can be emphasized.

Let anyone look over the pastures in his section and observe how often they are grazed down so close to the ground that it is simply impossible for the animals to secure sufficient feed. Much of the complaint heard, that some of our Southern pasture plants are not as nutritious as the plants of other sections, is due to the animals failing to get enough of them, rather than to any lack of nutritive ly, have we noticed that when a man provides grazing crops for hogs he frequently only sets aside about one half as much land for this purpose as he should, and the same thing is true to only a slightly less extent with most of our other pastures.

We should first remember that our lands are not rich, or at least those we generally set aside for pasture are not rich. It requires rich land for a large production of pasturage, just as it does for all other crops. If our land was high-priced or scarce there might be some excuse for the making of small pastures, but we have an abundance of land that might be profitably pastured, which is now not being used at all or is being cultivated at a loss. But whatever the size of the pastures, the livestock should not be allowed to graze them too closely. It will pay better to reduce the number of animals rather than to graze the pastures so closely that the animals suffer for a lack of feed or the pastures cannot do their best. Of course, some pastures will graze more animals than others and the same pasture will furnish very much more feed some years than others; but the correct plan is to take into consideration the quality of the land and the pasture and only put such stock on it as it will probably graze the most unfavorable seasons. It is true that the best results are not obtained from a pasture which has so few animals on IF YOU WANT TO BUY A PAIR OF it that the pasture plants become large, coarse and dry; but this is much less objectionable than that animals mowing machine can always be used to cut the plants if they become too large, provided the land is i nsuch condition that a mower can be run over it.

But apart from the loss which results from too close grazing, ebcause the animals get insufficient feed, there are other unfavorable results, which are still more important as affecting the building up of good pastures. Pasture plants not only cannot make as good growth when grazed too closely, but they are often actually killed by too close grazing, especially if time is before they have thoroughly established themselves on the land. Old, well-established pastures, where a complete sod covers the ground, will stand close grazing at intervals without serious injury; but new pastures are likely to be completely destroyed.

Moreover, a pasture with a good WE CAN SAVE YOU MONEY NOW. WE CAN SAVE YOU MONEY NOW. growth of grass on it when the fist killing frosts come will furnish feed and lengthen the fall grazing period more than can be done in any other way .- Progressive Farmer.
