So much in the development of a chick depends on it being properly started that it is most essential to have all conditions prior to hatching as nearly right as possible; that is, properly fed hens and the proper incubation of the egg they lay. It always seems best to remove the chicks from the incubator as soon as possible, and keep them in a warm place where they can remain quietly, gathering enough strength after their struggle to force themselves from their shells, before they are ready to remove to the fireless brooder. Nothing is better for this purpose than a box 12 to 18 inches square, according to the hatch, filled to a depth of four or five inches with cut clover. A nest for the chicks is hollowed in the center of the clover, and after the chicks are placed in the nest they are covered with a wadded blanket two or three inches thick. This can be placed directly over them, and there will be no danger of them smothering, even though kept from twelve to twenty-four hours, thus confined.

There should, however, be at least six chicks hatched before placing them in the nest, as it requires that number to develop enough body heat to keep each other warm. Any place out of the way, that is dry and about 60 degrees, will do to set the box, and it should never be placed to near a stove or other sources of heat.

A bright day will go far to start the chicks right. If brooded out of doors, a few hours of sunshine will greatly lessen the work of teaching them to use their new quarters.

It requires some little attention to observe these conditions, but, when systematically attended to, consume only time that is well spent. A chick that does not thrive under these conditions will amount to little or nothing, and is not worth saving. It is best, and far more profitable, to spend time bettering the conditions of healthy chicks than to try to doctor those that do not have it in them to pull themselves through. If a chick's brooding-place is clean, dry and wholesome, and they have a little litter as well as dirt to scratch in, the healthy members of the flock will not spend much time outside of the brooder when not busy at work. A healthy chick will seek the brooder when wanting to rest or get warm, and it can safely be said that the chick that stands outside, possessing little or no activity will never amount to much, and the chances are that sooner or later it will go down. It is, therefore, of great importance to keep the chicks busy. They should be given a proper place to work in, with something to work for, and then it should be seen that they are constantly on the move, for it is this condition that prompts health and induces rapid growth.—Sel.

Was Moses an Electrician?

It is generally agreed that the ancient Egyptians had some knowledge of electricity, but that the Israelites had any such knowledge has never been put forward as yet, says The Chicago Examiner. But an engineer of Munich has written an article in a German review to prove that the Israelites were electricians. Or, at least, if the Israelites were not, Moses was.

The Munich engineer considers that the Brazen Serpent that Moses set up was nothing else than a lightning conductor, and that the serpents against which it guarded the children of Israel were the lightning itself. But his most curious speculations are those in the Ark of the Covenant, and of the terrible death which menaced many sacrilegious persons who ventured to touch it.

He affirms that the Ark, with its metal plates was in reality a huge Leyden jar charged with electricity, and that its discharge was powerful enough to kill a man. Only the initiated could approach protected by the metallic robes of the priests, which reach down to the ground and carried off the discharge of electricity.

The engineer quotes many passages from the Old Testament in support of his theory, and it is quite possible that Moses who had learned much of the magic of the Egyptians, had acquired a knowledge of electricity, which in later years was forgotten by the successor of Aaron.
