SAVING YOUR PEANUT CROP

Digging and Stacking Are Very Important in Care Of Peanuts

By J. H. BEATTIE

(Associate Horticulturist, U. S. Department of Agriculture)

Much of the value of a good peanut crop may be lost through improper harvesting and handling. Well-matured, properly cured, bright peanuts, free from dirt and trash, command the highest prices and every grower has a chance to make more money out of his peanuts by following the practices which insure a crop of this character.

When to Harvest

Peanuts should be harvested before the vines are killed by frost. When to harvest may be determined by a slight yellowing of the foliage and by the appearance of the kernels, which should be full-grown and beginning to color and show darkened veins. There are always more or less immature pods on the vines, and it is necessary to harvest when the greatest number are in prime condition. Peanuts should not be harvested while the dew is on or during cloudy or rainy weather.

Methods of Digging

They should be loosened from the soil by means of a sharp instrument that will sever the taproot below the peanuts, leaving the portion of the roots carrying the nodules in the soil. A curved steel bar with a sharp cutting edge attached to twin plowbeams is excellent, as it slides along under the pods or nuts, cutting the roots, loosening the plants, and leaving the lower portions of the roots undisturbed. Whatever implement is used, it should leave the nodule-bearing roots in the soil.

Shaking Out and Drying

Hand shaking out after loosening with the digger is a necessary part of the work. It is impossible to do this work with forks or other tools and keep the vines straight, and unless they are straight good stacking can not be accomplished. All soil must be shaken off, for if placed in the stacks it will cause discoloration and spoilage of the peanuts. The vines should be laid in rows with the tops all one way and allowed to wilt before stacking.

Stacking

Proper stacking is the most important part in saving the peanut crop. Good peanuts can not be produced by windrow curing or with careless stacking.
