A Big Steal

Sincerely believing they had a meritorious claim, Martin County people recognize the refusal of the State Highway and Public Works Commission to refund to several counties money expended for the construction of main highways as the one big steal of the century. The State has repudiated its promise to the people, they say, and they are irked no little to see an all-powerful agency continue its ruthless march on the backs of poverty and actual want back in the counties.

Forced to recognize the refund problem, the State administrations apparently said in the beginning that not a single crumb will fall from the heavily laden table of the highway commission, and today the only danger hanging over the road fund is the right of the General Fund to step in and take a bite that the numerous commissions might continue well

Facts and figures well planted in the minds of Martin County people have never been brought to light by those designated with the task of investigating the merits of the claims to road refunds. "Advance the money now, and the State will assume the responsibility later," Martin County people were told. "There'll be some revenue for you from the gas tax," they were assured. The promises have been forgotten by those who made them, and the gas tax is packed away in Raleigh out of reach of everyone except the few.

At no time was it ever pointed out that North Carolina paid for a road and then turned around and maintained that it was not right to pay for a link connecting the first road. Little was said about at least one county and possibly others receiving refunds.

Martin County spent half a million dollars building main highway routes and after saddling its property owners with heavy taxes it did not and could not properly finance its secondary system. And then the North Carolina Highway Commission comes along and points out that Martin County failed to build good secondary roads, and intimates that it cannot do anything to relieve the situation.

The claims to road refunds have been denied and the highway folks now say Martin County is getting its share of the maintenance fund. It's a peculiar system of bookkeeping they have up in Raleigh.

Slightly Out Of Date

More than ten years ago, a Martin County man bought a truck. The wear and tear carried the machine to the junk heap two or three years later. This week, the purchaser of that old truck received from the Motor Vehicle Bureau of the North Carolina State Department of Revenue a notice that 1938 license tags were to be placed on the old machine.

It is a bit difficult to understand why a department, headed by efficiency experts and surely fairly-well paid captains of industry, would put the State to the expense of mailing strictly out_of-date notices.

The cost probably isn't much, but it is probable that one or two miles of Martin County 'tater rides could be widened to a respectable width with the amount of money that is being thrown away sending out notices that have been out of date for years.

And the South Sleeps On

"The people are waking up," critics of the New Deal point out in explaining the Republican gains in the recent election. "They are tired of all this government spending; they are tired of a dictatorship,' some of thm go so far as to say in rejoicing over the weakened ranks.

While the official returns are not available at this time, the press points out that North Carolina and the South held its Democratic maforities and even increased them in some sections. Is it that the South still sleeps?

It would appear that many have recovered their hides lost in 1932 and are now ready to return for another fleecing.

PUBLISHED EVERY A Crowning Achievement

Celebrating a few days ago its fiftieth anniversary, The Charlotte News, one of the foremost afternoon papers in the South and a unique one in all the country, issued a 172page edition, an edition that comes as a crowning achievement in the lives of the Dowd Brothers and one that does credit to Charlotte and North Carolina and even the South.

Interesting are the revived stories of the long ago, and encouraging is the reward reaped after years of trials and tribulations that are common to the lot of everyone of us in all fields of endeavor. And while the edition comes as a crowning achievement for those who have labored long and hard, and while it expresses bigness and the capacity to match the production of the great metropolitan presses, the Charlotte News is not wrapped in its entirety in those 172 pages. It goes back to the early days when the late W. C. Dowd struggled at the helm and advanced principles that were to promote the welfare and interests of a New South. Those principles are kept alive today by two sons who are awake to the needs of North Carolina and the other Southern States.

J. E. and W. C. Dowd, Jr., were handed a big assignment following the death of their father. That they have succeeded and succeeded well in handling that assignment is evidenced in the character, size and style of their fiftieth anniversary edition, an edition that almost upsets the balance in a small country printer's corner, but one that will be preserved as a valuable history of Charlotte from 1888 to the 1938.

A Bad Situation

It's a bad situation when any public agency closes its doors to the public, and then sticks a hand out for the taxpayers' money. It may be best at times to withhold certain information from the public, but whether it be for the best or the worst, the public is entitled to all the

Talking about the Highway Commission recently, the Greensboro News said: "The way it proceeds in its public relations these days, some of the inquiring brethren 'low as to how it's almost necessary to use road machinery to dig out information on what is distinctly Tom Tar Heel's very own business."

1939 Crop Control Vote

Goldsboro Transcript & Messenger.

On December 10 cotton farmers will decide by vote if they want the quota system of control continued for 193.

In all probability, the Department of Agriculture says, tobacco farmers will vote on the same day to decide if they want the quota and allotment system for tobacco continued anoth-

A vote on December 10 will insure sufficient time for the working out of basic information on which quotas are awarded well in advance of the planting season, that is if the vote is favorable. The favorable vote for the quota system for 1938 came so late that county committees and farm agents charged with putting the plan into effect did not have sufficient time for their task. They were forced to work under the greatest pressure to make allotments and get out cards before the farmers were clamoring for authorizations to sell their crops. Some of the confusion and objection to the plan as it has worked in 1938 certainly resulted from the speed and pressure under which the program had to be placed in effect.

On the other hand, however, there will be one objection to voting as early as December 10. The experience of 1938 has shown the pressing need for change, simplifications, clarification and improvement in the congressional act under which the quota plan operates. The Department of Agriculture and leading farm organizations and individuals already have moved to inaugurate legislation needed to make the quota plan more immediately understandable to the average man.

The insistence is so great that the next Congress is certain to attempt to rewrite and improve the plan, possibly through amendments. But the next Congress will not meet until January 1 and amendment or change in the act must wait this session. Some farmers who have opposed the quota plan may not be willing to trust to Congress to make the necessary changes in the act and may accordingly vote against the proposal to continue the plan.

As unsatisfactory as the program has been in many individual instances, its collective effect has been very favorable, particularly for tobac-

It now appears that this year's average for tobacco will be 23 to 24 cents a pound. The crop is short, partly because of the quota system. But farmers as a group will receive more money than would have been the case had acreage not been restricted. If every one had grown as much tobacco as he wanted to this year we should have seen a very depressed business condition in the tobacco growing sections. The prices would have been down around 10 cents, many studious men believe; this section would have been faced with a very serious condition.

In the face of these facts and recollections, of 9-cent tobacco a few years ago when there was no sort of control, farmers will think many times before voting to do away with the control plan, even if they have not approved of it
