

The Bars Are Down

Over a period of years, France gloried in a gay night life punctuated by loose morals, song and drink. Today, despite the Maginot line and one of the highest rating armies in the world. the French people are in bondage, facing starvation and an uncertain future.

Sometimes it would appear that we, as a people, are copying the ways of the French in some respects. Will that mean that we will go the way of France? It is now admitted by the students of history that the South would have never reclaimed itself after the Civil War had the people then possessed the brittle determination, the moral code and the diseased bodies and warped minds that too many of us possess today

It is not the purpose here to signal out any individual or group of individuals, but if we would realize the dangerous course that is being followed by America we would only have to turn our attention to a carnival on the fairgrounds here last week. A picture of the downward trail that is being followed possibly all over America was taken close home. Questionable shows, described by many as the most degrading ever seen on a midway here, operated on a full schedule without interference or even a slight protest. And the sad part about it is that the "leading" citizens crowded into the hovels. Possibly the "leading" citizens had a tendency to elevate some poor, unfortunate woman who in her path from the cradle to the present stumbled at the bidding of a loose mor al system that has already passed serious proportions. It is an established fact that the questionable shows would not have operated had the patronage been limited.

There were the fights on the midway, to be sure, but the saddest happening reported during the entire week centered around a mother and two small children. Staggering drunk, the woman was said to have paraded the midway with the tender hands of two little children serving as ballast. Sheriff C. B. Roebuck and other officers stated that young people were stepping into the limelight with the liquor bottle, that they actually advertised their brazen acts to others.

Sunday as the small bundle of hell moved out, the reports were freely advanced that the bars of common decency had been lowered. that this community was the poorer for having tolerated a class of entertainment that would tear down rather than build up a moral staming that is so badly needed in the world today. Williamston is carrying the stench of the degrading sideshows at its fair of last week. There are others just as bad, and by them possibly we will be awakened from our slumber to see the dangers that lurk in the paths of the immediate future. It can't be that a whole society will be measured by the happenings of last week, and the temporary lapse in a moral standard does not mean that conditions are as bad as the neighbors say they are. But if we would profit from the staggering facts as they appeared in bold relief before the eyes of our people last week, we must start patching our moral framework in other channels. That there is work to be done is found in the reading of vital statistics which are crowded with the recording of illegitimate births. The county courts almost without interruption book cases charging non-support, seduction under promise to marry and bastardy. Warrants by the scores are now in the hands of the sheriff charging victims with failure to comply with certain laws requiring treatment for social diseases. The sponsors of the fair, while subjected to criticism by some, are not responsible for the morals of a community. They started out with the sole purpose of offering agriculture in retrospect and of making available clean, wholesome entertainment. Reliable reports state that the agricultural premiums were paid, and despite reported weaknesses on the part of the management, the sponsors made a good start in reclaiming part of the prestige lost for the fair in recent years. That thousands enjoyed the event is certain and that some good was accomplished is not to be doubted, that more good can be accomplished is certain if we will start patching our defenses against the repercussion of bombs similar to the one exploding in our faces a week ago.,
