Timely Hints Given On Curing Of Pork

Recent cool days have ushered in another hog killing season. More hogs are being slaughtered than can be immediately consumed. Therefore, it is necessary to cure pork for future use.

Ellis Vestal, extension swine specialist of N. C. State College, offers timely hints for curing pork on the farm. To keep meat from spoiling, he says, it is absolutely essential to use clean containers. Oak barrels are commonly used, but stone jars are more easily kept clean. Thorough scrubbing and scalding are the proper methods of cleaning the containers.

Salt is the basis of all meat curing. Some people prefer the brine cure; some the dry salt cure. They are the same except that water is used in the brine cure. The curing agents are salt, sugar, and saltpeter.

Salt is the preservative and it drives out the moisture and meat juices. Sugar is used to give the meat a sweet flavor and to aid in counteracting the action of salt which tends to make meat hard and dry. Brown sugar gives the best flavor. Saltpeter, or potassium nitrate, gives the red color to the meat. Without saltpeter, the meat is gray in color when it comes out of the cure.

Beginners usually get a more uniform cure with the brine method. However, this method is not satisfactory when the temperature is above 40 degrees Fahrenheit. Under warm conditions, the brine will sour, causing the meat to spoil. Baking soda is sometimes used to prevent the souring of the brine.

County farm agents are prepared to furnish full directions for curing pork on the farm.
