HARDING NOW BIDDING FOR SUPPORT OF INDEPENDENTS

There is something evangelical about President Harding's Western travels. His ardor for social justice and the rights of labor is mingled with expressions of deep religious fervor and moral appeal. Two of his predecessors were successful by similar position in enhancing their prestige. Whatever effect it may have—whether it disappoints the so-called "hard boiled" element in the Republican party which has been generous with campaign contributions because of a belief that Harding would bring back the "good old days" of low wages or whether it tends to bring the West back to a regular Republican President who proclaims himself a progressive—there can hardly be any doubt that Warren Harding is sincerely convinced of the merit of his own doctrine. He is inspired by an idealism that seems constantly to be battling to get away from the materialistic tendency of the age. This is nowhere better illustrated than in the following lines of his peroration at Helena:

"Mankind never has stood more in need than it does now of the consolation and reassurances which derive from a firm religious faith. There must be no mistake whereby we shall confuse the things which are of eternity with those which are of time. We must not let our engrossment with the things of matter and of mind distract us from a proper concern for those which are of the spirit and the soul."
