A Lost Opportunity

America is bound to view with grave concern the rupture between France and England as to the French occupation of the Ruhr, but there doesn't seem to be anything that American can do about it.

On Saturday, August 11, Lord Curzon flatly declared the French occupation of the Ruhr illegal. On Sunday, August 19, Premier Poincare of France, speaking at Charleville within the shadow of the building which was the seat of the German military headquarters, said:

This really is an unhappy argument, especially when the text of the treaty of Versailles and the declarations made collectively by the Allies, including Great Britain, prior to January 11, 1923, recognized the right of the Allies to occupy additional territory as security for payment of reparations.

Instead of engaging in controversies of this sort, the premier continued, we should better be advised to see practical solutions of problems toward which no one may show lack of interest. Europe will recover its economic and moral equilibrium only on such a day, as peace shall be established upon a solid basis. Peace entails the loyal execution of treaties signed and justice exacts complete reparation for damages caused.

As to America's attitude toward the controversy which seems to be daily widening the breach between England and France the Greensboro News in a recent editorial says:

As far as the American people are concerned, they have no direct interest in this quarrel, except as it may contain the germs of future wars; but for the very reason that it may contain them, Americans must necessarily take a keen interest in the progress of the negotiations. Moreover, the sympathy of the people will inevitably go to one side or the other, and even the popular sympathy, not backed by any sort of governmental interference, of as huge a nation as the United States is in itself an immense force. It would be lamentable if that sympathy went to the wrong side.

In the first place, the Britons have the advantage in appealing to Americans, for America is only less anxious than Great Britain herself to see some kind of settlement arranged. Furthermore, the country has been doubtful from the beginning of the efficacy of the Ruhr intervention, and nothing has occurred to settle its doubts. On the other hand, this country is not sure just how much of British policy is based on a real desire for peace, and how much on a desire to cripple French influence and power on the continent of Europe. We are more than willing to lend a hand in establishment of peace, but we have no desire to be used for the establishment of a British ascendancy over France.

Our great opportunity passed four years ago. Had we joined in energetically in the settlement of the European chaos, the Ruhr invasion in all likelihood never would have taken place, and it is probable that long ere this the total of German reparations would have been not only fixed, but partially paid. However, it is no use to cry over spilt milk. All that is left to us now seem to be a policy of watchful waiting, including a firm refusal to be drawn into blind allegiance to any purely nationalistic scheme, whether British, French, or any other.

Did It Really Happen?

When a New Yorker recovered from a drunken spree it was to discover himself married to an actress whom he had known for only four days, according to the story being told in the daily newspapers now.

"When I found what I had let myself in for," says the husband, "I determined to make the best of it, but I've never been intoxicated since."

Here seems to be at least one authenticated instance of a woman's reforming a man by marrying him.

Broken, they say, in health, sore in spirit and, we mistrust, sad at heart, Cameron Morrison ought to be a horrible example to sundry North Carolinians who have seemed to be impressed that it would be nice to be Governor of North Carolina.
