R. F. WHITMIRE'S IDEAS ON REARING CHILDREN

Editor, News:

As I have not heard from Calvert lately I will write some in regard to training children. In the first place my babies are taught from earliest infancy that crying for a thing will not get it. Should I give in and accede to their crying demands I would lose control over them and they would lose their respect for me.

My rules are few and simple. They are reasonable, humane, and I seldom use the rod.

Iron clad rules will not work in the proper management of a family of normal children. They must be elastic but not slack.

Gentle persuasion, I find, is better than all the whipping, scolding, fault finding or nagging I have ever heard about, and as it brings results every time, it makes home brighter, sweeter and better in ever sense of the word. Also life is much more pleasant for mother and children where the home is ruled by love.

I always refrain from using the eternal don't's. I honestly believe that don't's work a deal of harm in every home where they are the by word, so have eliminated them from my vocabulary. But about table manners. My children do not eat the highest seasoned food or the richer pastries or desserts, yet seem perfectly contented with their plain wholesome food.

My children are taught that the heavy rich foods, such as their elders eat are not good for their growing bodies; that they will stunt the mind and body, ruin their health and that father and mother understand what will make them enjoy a happy, sturdy childhood and will cause them to grow into strong, healthy men able to pass any test required of them.

This is taught to them in story or parable form and my babies take the greatest interest in every lesson. As for being content with their simpler meals. My babies are taught in case one is naughty at table he is required to finish the meal at kitchen table. This punishment is mild, but it works wonders. I never make a child go without a meal as punishment; I never shut a child in a dark closet or send him to a dark cellar. I do not punish my children before strangers or before each other.

What goes on between us at such times is a profound secret between the offender and me. I never punish by trying to frighten my children into obedience and I never promise them a punishment that isn't reasonable,—forthcoming. That is the whole secret of my training. I would like to hear a reply from someone like R. F. WHITMIRE. Calvert, N. C.

GOOD PUBLICITY FOR OAKLAND, THIS COUNTY

Oakland, the postoffice near Lake Toxaway, has an opportunity to have a living oak in the public square of a city of 235,675 inhabitants.

Recently Oakland, California, tried, but in vain, to induce 27 other Oaklands to relinquish their names. Having failed in this the Oakland Chamber of Commerce comes back with the request that each of these Oaklands in 27 states "share in the fame enjoyed by the oldest, most prosperous and internationally renowned Oakland," by sending a small oak for transplanting in the park adorned by a $2,000,000 city hall. The group of oaks is intended to take the place of a giant oak, now in decay, where it stood in the Oakland plaza for 500 years.
