Your Child And The School

By Miss Lucille Hunt

It has been observed that the hygienic classroom is one permeated by a spirit of friendliness, sympathetic concern, and genuine affection. In such a classroom, happiness and success in individually suitable and challenging tasks are powerful contributors to wholesome personality development. A sense of "belonging" to a group is another psychological imperative in the creation of an atmosphere for effective learning. Similarly essential in promoting growth is the changing, evolving curriculum through which children may express, enrich, and develop their varied interests in terms of their unique needs. Reading is only one phase of such a curriculum. The essential principles stressed in reading apply to every subject and to every area of instruction. They are grounded in a respect for children and youth and in a sincere recognition of the needs and rights of every individual — the teacher as well as the student. Widely followed, such an approach will be a guarantee of great and far reaching gains in human welfare and human happiness. The reading process will then assume its role as a powerful factor in improving the welfare and in fostering the happiness of all our people.

1. Does the present-day method work?

You will be happy to see how well it does work.

This incident happened not long ago. Two little boys were walking home from school. Tom said, "That was funny, the way Sally (a character in the Basic Reader) thought the hippopotamus was a pig."

His companion, Jack, said, "And the way she thought the zebra was a striped horse."

The U. S. Department of Agriculture has announced that thru December 1949 farmers had put approximately 534,352,976 bushels of 1949-crop wheat, barley, oats, rye, flaxseed, soybeans, corn, and grain sorghums under Commodity Credit Corporation price support.

Tom added, "And the way she thought the elephant has two tails."

Jack thought a minute. "Sally's just a baby. She doesn't know much."

Tom, thoughtfully: "No. Did you ever see a hippopotamus? It does look like a pig."

Jack: "I can see how she thought a zebra was a horse if she didn't know any better."

Tom: "It's funny the way an elephant had a trunk in front and a tail in back. Elephants are funny. Sally will learn when she is big."

Jack: "Yes, like us."
These children were much impressed by what they read at school, and kept thinking about it as they walked home from school. Sally, of course, was just a character in a book, but she had come alive for them and might have been a little girl in the neighborhood.

This kind of thing is happening all over the country with reading today. Children are reading alertly. We have material to challenge them to think, and a method that works because it is based on the psychology of how children learn. We have more children succeeding with reading, and more really competent readers than ever before. And reading is making a greater contribution to child development.

What we are trying to do is to get children to read on all cylinders; when we can do that, they learn to read, and they learn from reading.
