U. S. FORCES MAKE STRONG AMPHIBIOUS LANDING IN KOREA

Heavy Air Power Aiding Yanks in Halting On Rushing Communist

Under an umbrella of U. S. planes and cover of warships, U. S. troops made their first amphibious landing operation of the Korean War on Wednesday, Tokyo time.

The landing was unopposed although Korean Reds were known to be in the vicinity. The U. S. troops drove ashore on the East Coast of the peninsula.

The move to rush more Americans to the fighting front came as the invaders were knocking on the door at the city of Taejon. The Reds apparently were catching their breath after taking a hammering by air and infantry resistance aground at Taejon.

The beachhead was quickly established. Strong forces built up along the beach as advance forces speared inland.

The convoy moved in under cover of U. S. and British planes. Navy warships kept watch on the sea on the lookout for Russian submarines that have been known to operate in the area.

All those who sell or are in anyway connected with the market are urged to make plans to be there with weed cutting tools, paint brushes, and dressed for work.

WHIPOORWILL IS PART OF CAST OF "UNTO THESE HILLS"

CHEROKEE, N. C., July 14—A whippoorwill forced Kermit Hunter to change a line in his great Cherokee Indian Drama, "Unto These Hills."

The whippoorwill appeared suddenly on the night of the dress rehearsal and wormed his way into the cast. He's been appearing on schedule ever since.

In scene nine of the play, with the Cherokee hoping that some miracle will occur to prevent their removal to the west, Wilani, the wife of the martyr-to-be Tsali, has a premonition of the disaster ahead.

"All day—the birds have not been singing," she comments to her white friend, Mrs. Perkins. That's where the whippoorwill entered, crying his lonesome cry—"These old hills, these old hills." Kermit Hunter changed the line to:

"All day—the birds have had strange voices." Thus, the whippoorwill entered the cast—an unpaid member. Also very exclusive. He comes unseen to the tree back of the center stage at Mountainside Theatre, and leaves unseen. And he's only missed his cue once.
