POISON IN IVY

Botanists know several kinds of poison-ivy plants and a wide variety of local names such as poison oak, three-leaved ivy, poison creeper, oakleaf poison ivy, climbing sumac, markweed, picry, and mercury. The poison oak of the Western states is also called poison ivy. These plants, and their close relative, poison sumac, are similar in their poisonous properties.

"Their poisonous principle," says the Department of Agriculture, "is a non-volatile oily substance known as toxicedendrol which has such violently iritant properties that the is capable of producing severe inflamation. All parts of the plant con-Call your local agent for transportation arrangements or tain the poison, even after long drying, but growth in which the sap is abundant is the most dangerous."
All these toxicodendrol-bearing plants with the exception of poison sumae.
