A. W. COATES, Register of Deeds and Ex-officio Clerk Board County Commissioners

College Extension Service, says that North Carolina farmers should utilize their idle acreages by seeding more wheat, oats, and barley.

"There is still time for farmers to seed additional acres to barley, wheat and oats," he declared, "but this should be done as soon as possible." If you do not have the necessary machinery for preparing the land and seeding the crop, Dr. Collins suggests that you see your neighbor or county agent. They can assist you in locating the desired machinery, either on a rental basis or for custom operation. Local fertilizer supplies should be sufficient to meet all requirements, he stated. However, if you cannot find the fertilizer locally, your county agent can help locate it elsewhere. Farmers are also urged to get their nitrogen supplies as early as possible. Conditions in the mid-western grain belt now point to a much shorter than usual spring wheat crop, because of lack of soil moisture at seeding time. Since much of the grain that is used in North Carolina comes from the mid-western area, an even greater challenge is made to Tar Heel farmers to supplement this supply by producing it at home. Dairymen, poultrymen, beef cattle and swine producers should "go all out" toward producing their needed grain requirements, Dr. Collins said. There is still plenty of certified small grain seed on the market, and since small grain seeding does not require much labor, and will grow on a wide variety of soils, increased acreage on most farms should present no problems. If, after seeding the crop, you decide not to let it mature for grain, then it can be grazed or cut for hay. The main thing, says Dr. Collins, is to seed it now, and regardless of how you use it, you will be helping out in the grain emergency.

Mrs. Brown: "But why should your husband want to sell your new car?" Mrs. Smith: "Oh, he says the outgo for upkeep is too much for his income."
