ACP PROMOTES LIVESTOCK INCOME

North Carolina livestock and dairy farmers have used the Agricultural Conservation Program in establishing needed pasture and hay crops according to A. P. Hassell pointed out further that since 1959, over 360,000 acres have been established under the program. This has been a program that served a very vital conservation need and at the same time helped farmers make needed adjustments in their farming operations.

Hassell says that much of the acreage seeded to permanent cover had a serious erosion problem. The establishing of permanent cover has prevented soil erosion and the run-off of much excess water. To the individual farmer, it has meant making needed adjustments to provide needed hay or grass for his farm animals. It has also helped diversify many farming operations by the adding of livestock income.

Face Fly Causes Pink Eye Spread In Western N. C.

The incident of pink eye has increased greatly in Western North Carolina since the introduction of the face fly. Pink eye has always been present in Western North Carolina and we have always known that it is very contagious, but until the face fly came on the scene it was usually confined to the herd where it first appeared and could usually be traced back to an animal which had come through a public auction place or in contact with other outside cattle. Now the face fly can spread it across the fence, across the river, or even across the mountain in just a few minutes. The face fly feeds on the fluid which is secreted from the eye and nose. In order to get the eye of an animal to secrete this fluid, it uses its front feet to irritate the corner of the eye causing it to tear. The fly, when irritating the membrane at the corner of the eye of an animal which has pink eye, picks up the organisms causing the infection on the hairs of its front feet. Then when it flies to the next animal and irritates the membrane in the corner of its eye it implants the disease in the eye, spreading the disease. The farmers in this area can look forward to a real problem with pink eye, until an effective control of the face fly can be found.
