Farmers Are Urged To Turn Tobacco Fields

By WILEY DUVALL
Agricultural Extension Agent

Farmers are urged to turn their tobacco fields as soon as the crop is in the barn.

The blue mold epidemic of this year is the first ever to hit Madison County burley. In past years, there have been some isolated cases in burley fields, but never an epidemic. Not only did the disease cause dead spots with mold on leaves, but it went all through the system of the plant. Roots were stunted, the stalk was stunted, and leaves were twisted and broken. The twisted leaves caused many farmers to suspect fertilizer damage. The fertilizer was not at fault. Any affected stalk could be peeled and a brown color found under the skin. Blue mold was the culprit.

The bluish-colored spores are gone and will not spend the winter here. There is another type of blue mold spore that is resistant and can spend the winter here. In the event weather conditions next spring are as bad as they were this past summer, the disease could be even worse.

For this reason, all tobacco farmers are urged to turn all fields completely under as soon as the crop is in the barn. This is a recommendation of Furney Todd, Tobacco Disease Specialist, N.C. State University, and your local Extension staff.

Fall turning should lessen the chances of a blue mold epidemic next year. Fall turning will also decrease the incidence of nine other pests. These pests are etch and brein mottling, budworms, horn worms, flea beetles, nematode viruses, black root rot, and weeds.

It is necessary that all roots be completely destroyed and all stubble, weeds, and trash be completely buried.

In 1852, a fire swept Montreal, killing more than 100 persons and destroying three-fourths of the city.
