Sense Of Taste Fades With Age

Many elderly people lose their appetites because a lot of foods tend to taste the same, a Duke University psychologist says.

"An elderly person may be able to detect that a food has a taste, but not be able to tell what the food actually is," said Dr. Susan Schiffman of the school's medical center.

The conclusion is one of several she made after comparing the senses of smell and taste between college students and the elderly.

Ms. Schiffman found that the younger subjects were able to detect an odor at much lower concentrations than were the elderly. Smell, researchers have found, is closely related to taste.

"Because the neurological functions that govern these senses decrease with age, the elderly can lose the intensity of taste and smell senses they had when younger," she said.

Foods used in the taste and smell study were blended and cooked to the same consistency, and those being tested were blindfolded so they couldn't judge foods by appearance.

More than 80 percent of the college students properly identified the taste of an apple, compared with 55 percent of the elderly subjects.

And she also found that because the smell of sweets isn't as easily detectable by older persons, foods such as chocolate may taste bitter.

The decline in sensory ability in the elderly is a result of age-related neuron loss, Ms. Schiffman said. Neurons are the fundamental units of nervous tissue.

"Tastes are coded across neurons. For example, there is a difference in the neuron codes for salty tastes and for bitter tastes," she said. "With age, we drop neurons, and so with age there is less difference between the two patterns."
