COMPANY FOR YOURSELF

Philadelphia Public Ledger.

A man is not happy until he has reached an understanding with himself and learned to command his own life. It is for him to choose whether the man he is shall be his best friend or his worst enemy.

"Greater is he that rethinks himself than he that taketh a city." The famous story of Robert Louis Stevenson, "Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," depicts a desperate battle between two sides of our human nature—one side given to nature in good, the other side, revealing all that is evil. The two sides are united in the one personality, and it is a tragic tale that portrays a man turning in the twinkling of an eye from all that is deserving of men's praise to all that earns the feelings of detestation.

He who wears the veil of hypocrisy and thinks he can deceive the rank and file of mankind with his disguise cannot continue to fool the many who, with a shrewd insight of human nature, quickly penetrate the delusion and bring the man to justice. He cannot deceive himself. He must find himself sooner or later torn by an anguish of conscience. He wishes he might retrace his steps; but it is too late. He made his choice long ago and there is no retraction.

The man on good terms with himself is not tortured by vain regrets. The path lies straight and clear ahead of him. He has disciplined his own nature to serve him in a crisis and to be true to what he has taught himself to do and to be.

When he is by himself he is not wretchedly lonely for he is rich in mental resources. His reminiscences are pleasurable. At will he calls up pictures of the past which he likes to see once more, even as a traveler looks through an album of views which recalls his memorable and delightful journey.

We cannot at all times enjoy the supreme privilege of having our friends about us. Only now and then may we climb the heights and behold the far landscapes and take breath and a heart of grass again. Most of the time we must go on the level and the best. We must depend on our own strength; we cannot lean upon those who would fain share our burden when their duty keeps them far away. They would like to carry our load, but since they cannot we must shoulder it without complaining.

Therefore, we must not let the lower element in our nature win the victory so that the vile distorts the good. We cannot afford to lead the "double life." The better self is the only self for which, in the short and only life of a man, we should strive.

His speech is low, deliberate, agreeable, and has something of the rhythmic cadence of a preacher.

Days spent on the golf links have given him a rather ruddy complexion. He has small, keen, steel blue, restless eyes. He has a wide, thoughtful mouth, seated at the corners with lines of repression and tenacity.

Mr. Rockefeller was an old man at 60, but through care, careful diet and exercise, is a young man at 80.
