The Fair Edition

If we may be permitted to talk shop a moment, The Dispatch desires to call particular attention to the great volume of advertising carried in this issue and to express appreciation of the cooperation given it by the business men of Dunn.

It was not until last Saturday that we could begin to plan this edition. Monday was the first day we could devote to it. For this reason there are many business men and houses not represented in the advertising columns. Practically every person solicited for an advertisement gave it quickly and without argument.

In consequence we were forced to discontinue solicitation early in the week. This accounts for the absence of some of our business men's names from this issue.

Maurice R. Beaman, secretary of the Raleigh Chamber of Commerce, will be Dunn's guest Friday night, when he comes to tell a body of business men how chambers of commerce are organized and operated.

Mr. Beaman is a Sampson County man, who, through close association with railway officials, became one of the most efficient freight rate experts of the country.

"The Ode" and Other Smells

It cannot be doubted that directors of the Seminole Fertilizer Company will yield to the requests of south-side residents and discontinue the use of such ingredients as that which has so thoroughly outraged the olfactory senses of citizens during the last two weeks.

While our citizens are engaged in this crusade, however, we trust that they will not pause with the correction of this evil. There are many other places from which equally disagreeable and unhealthy odors emanate.

In the case of the fertilizer plant the town government was without authority to act. In the cases to which we refer, however, the authorities can take effective action.

What is Wrong With Butler's Appointment?

Governor Bickett needs no alibi for his appointment of former Senator Marion Butler as a member of that body which is to represent the cotton interests of the State.

As though the press has become excited over the matter and the Governor made by the "rubber stamp" route, The Dispatch fails to see that any great harm or wrong has been done.

able to neutralize some of the many alleged wrongs perpetrated by him, no charitable person will desire to deny him the opportunity—especially when he is the chosen of his people.

RECOLLECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS

A HOME TOWN TRAGEDY

Reading Morse Henry Waterson's reminiscences in the Saturday Evening Post a few weeks ago we ran across a slight reference to Beau Hickman, an eccentric character who adorned the hotels of Washington in the pre-war days when Colonel Waterson was a young newspaper man there.

Because of him we had an especial interest in Miss Mary Jane—a wrinkled, refined little pauper who would never admit her poverty. Miss Mary Jane did not like children—they were too inquisitive and too brutal in their frankness.

Miss Mary Jane was very proud. She never went out without an old knit shawl of fine texture, but sadly worn; and she had a little bonnet of flimsy material that she tucked under her trembling chin with black, faded ribbon.

We can see her now, tripping down the hill that descended beside Governor Carr's old home, where a dead Yankee soldier had been buried by Sherman's Army when it passed through home after Johnston's surrender at Durham.

At the county farm they gave her a nice little cottage all to herself. On her second day there all the good old sisters who were already there paid the usual call of courtesy.

Very kindly she thanked them for the invitations; and very gently but also very firmly she told them of the great grief that lay between them. "I am a Hickman," she said, "and I don't let you know that however kindly I may feel toward you, I can never allow you to associate with me on terms of social equality. Good day."

So, Miss Mary Jane lived in solitary grandeur at the poor house—an aristocrat, a patrician—reduced, it was true, to the necessity of receiving alms, but undefeated still. And so she died.

That Dunn continues to look good to Dunn boys and girls who are away from home is evidenced by the following letter just received from Miss Gladys Jernigan, who is now with the bureau of war risk insurance in Washington:

"The Dispatch has just come to me and I must write you how very very much I enjoyed reading your heart felt piece 'Back Home Again.'"

"How well can I see Broad Street just now along the corner of Wilson & Lee's, the point of observation for everything, the familiar faces standing by the curb talking, automobiles parked 'all along the line' and the views from both directions 'way down the street with those beautiful elm trees tops meeting as you gaze down about two miles. Gee! No wonder I'm so comfortable to think about it and I would so much like to be there."

cars meet, sing and shout to the steady sounding beats of the drum, where the Fords are lined up waiting to kick in cranking for hire, and where one's nerves are relieved from the heavy street traffic occasionally by the passing of a lengthy freight train speeding about ten miles per hour and thereby checking for awhile the fuss and noise of all passing automobiles, cars and Fords—a station where a ticket can be bought to any destination without the slightest confusion as to how, where and what window, where you can see with your own eyes your baggage there on the tray ready to go with you and lots of other things pomforting—Dunn has them all."
