

Music Means Much To Harnett County Folk

If music had meant as much to the State of Georgia as it meant one day last month of Harnett county, grand opera could probably have escaped our neighbor's legislators unscathed by a $2,500 tax.

In the Farmers' Warehouse at Lillington, on September 10, Harnett's third annual county sing, unique and remarkable example of community recreation, with 5,000 people in attendance, was held under the auspices of the county department of public welfare, with Miss Mayne Camp, superintendent, the chief promoter.

It was a big day for Harnett. Lillington's streets in all directions were packed thick with machines. Their passengers jammed the warehouse to its utmost corners and stood, six and seven deep, around its open doors. Others for whom there was no room in the crowd within contented themselves with sitting outside in the air in machines and on the grass and listening there to the music that swelled from the building. A great concourse of neighbors, it was, gathered with interest, in many cases with enthusiasm, simply for the sake of music!

And the music that Harnett county sang lustily was popular music—not popular in the sense that it included the imbecilities of jazz, but popular in being familiar and simple, the sort of music that is easily and spontaneously sung, and in the ringing of which there is a certain comradeship.

Competitive class singing by the townships took up the morning with a special feature program in the afternoon.

In front of a wall banked with their own flora, long-leaf pine sprinkled with sprays of golden-rod each class took the platform and sang for the honor of its native hearth. The Lillington chorus carried off the silver and Neil's Creek and Dunn won second and third place, respectively.

For the congregational singing, in which practically every one joined, from the old gentleman who looked like Walt Whitman to the flushed young matron with baby in arm, Harnett was fortunate in having Roy L. Hoffmeister, of Baltimore, as director. He is a genius in his way, evidently born to extract harmony from a throng of naturally bashful people. His swinging arms and swaying body drew it from them and made poured from five thousand throats and flooded the place. "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty," thundered Ham Hoffmeister, and the rafters shook. It was wonderful!—Public Welfare Progress.

One hundred and fifty club boys and 50 club girls took part in the contests and demonstrations arranged at the State Fair by the Agricultural Extension Service last week.

Gullies are monuments to the greed of men who farm for themselves alone; men who give no thought to the welfare of coming generations.
