A great portion of these sales have been repeat business—the proof of the pudding is the eating thereof. Why suffer with indigestion and stomach trouble? MEASLES

The specific virus causing measles has not yet been isolated but it has been conclusively proven that the causative organism is present and will pass through an exceedingly fine filter. It is found to be present in the secretions from the nose and pharynx twenty-four hours before the appearance of the rash and to remain present a day or two after the rash disappears.

Measles is perhaps the most easily transmissible of all the contagious diseases and is contagious from the beginning of the first catarrhal symptoms throughout the duration of the rash. The most infective period is the first twenty-four hours of the rash. One attack produces an immunity which in nearly all cases is permanent.

The disease is transmitted either directly by droplet spray in sneezing, coughing or talking or indirectly through objects freshly contaminated by such secretions. Outside the human body, the virus does not live long and contaminated objects under ordinary conditions are a menace for a period not exceeding twenty-four hours.

Persons of all ages who have never had measles are susceptible but the age of greatest incidence is about six or seven years. Deaths from measles, however, are in young children, 66 per cent under two years and 90 per cent under five years of age.

Measles at first appears very much like a common cold except the child is somewhat sicker than would be expected. If a child is sick with an apparently severe cold and has a temperature of 101 degrees, measles must be considered, especially if the eyes are red and watery and there is a severe cough. An apparent improvement in the child's condition frequently happens just preceding the appearance of the rash. The greatest danger from measles, especially in the older children, is from the complications. These are of two general types, (1) invasion of the upper respiratory tract causing pneumonia, otitis, mastoiditis and meningitis, and, (2) disturbances of the alimentary tract causing diarrhoea, enteritis and dysentery.

No method of vaccination has yet been perfected but the use of convalescent serum has proven very helpful.
