

Efforts Renewed To Rescue Paul Redfern In Brazil

Plane Has Already Arrived In British Guiana To Search For Georgia Flier

NEW YORK, Dec. 24.—Renewal of reports that Paul Redfern is still alive has led to organization of plans for two separate expeditions into the South American jungles to seek the Brunswick, Ga., flier who disappeared in 1927 in an attempted non-stop flight from his home town to Rio de Janeiro.

A seaplane from Georgetown, British Guiana, already has arrived at the village of Wanatoba, near the intersection of the frontier of Brazil, British Guiana and Dutch Guiana, to search for Redfern in the surrounding area of swamps and forests. In addition, the explorer William Lacarre recently stated he was planning to lead a rescue expedition headed by Major Willis Taylor, army flier at Panama, in the jungles of Dutch Guiana.

Many reports have come out of South America as to Redfern's whereabouts, since he last was seen by the master of Norwegian vessel Christian Krubg 165 miles off the Venezuelan coast. However, all previous attempts to determine Redfern's fate have been unsuccessful.

Within recent months, however, fresh reports that Redfern still lives have been received from two sources. On May 29, 1935, Tom Roche, a naturalized German-American citizen, told American Consul James L. Parks, of Colon, Panama, he had lived with Redfern in the Amazon jungles two years ago in a village inhabited by "Kirikicoto" Indians.

Roche said the flier's left arm and both legs were broken when the plane crashed against a mountain.

On June 25 last, James S. Lawton, American consular agent at Paramaribo, reported a new rumor. A young Creole had related to a Catholic mission priest at Drie Tabakjes that Redfern is a "white god" living in Dutch Guiana among the Indians. The Creole said both of Redfern's legs had been broken.

The expedition at Wanatoba includes the pilot, Art Williams, veteran American army flier; Harry Wendy, co-pilot; Edward Still, Georgetown timber merchant who financed the venture; and an Indian guide.

Few white men who vanished in the dense jungles of tropical America have come back to tell of their adventures. Early in 1934, however, one such case was recorded.

On March 10 of last year, a passenger plane crashed in the jungle-clad Andes of Columbia. The only survivor was an American mining engineer, Newton C. Marshall, who did not reach an outpost of civilization until April 6.

He recounted a passenger had been killed outright and another who suffered broken arms and legs died four days later. The pilot and a mechanic were injured. After two days they went into the woods in search of help but never have been heard from again.

Marshall, who had been injured severely, remained at the plane until conditions there forced him to abandon it. He wandered three days and nights in the jungles, living on water, until he met a party of primitive Guaqueo Indians who took him to the village of Bolivar Valle.

HOLLYWOOD—Everything is for sale, declare the cynics, but Sylvia Sidney, film star, discovered that $2,500 wouldn't buy a mutt dog from its owner, a South Dakota cowboy named Ger Orvedahl.

Sylvia Sidney

The actress' record offer and rebuttal took place on a movie location at Bear Lake, and uncovered an extraordinary story of love between master and animal.

Orvedahl, the man who loved his dog more than $2,500 worth, is a former range rider from Faith, S. D. About four years ago, he was seriously injured when a horse fell on him, and had to spend months in bed.

For company, he got a mongrel pup, half sheep dog, half collie, and began to teach him unusual tricks. Tuffy, as the pup was christened, grew so proficient that, a year ago, Orvedahl decided to bring the dog to Hollywood. He rode his horse all the way from South Dakota, arriving in Los Angeles broke and with no friends to get him into a studio.

One way or another, however, he and Tuffy finally got into the location company of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." There the dog's unusual intelligence and his affection for Orvedahl became a topic of conversation among the actors.

Finally, a wager was made. Sylvia Sidney contended the cowboy would sell the dog. Director Henry Hathaway was so sure not that he offered to pay for Tuffy if Sylvia could buy him. When the offer reached $2,500, Orvedahl gulped but still refused to sell. Now he's glad for Hathaway's change of mind.

Unlike the late Florina Ziegfeld, whom he portrays on the screen, William Powell has no valet. He won't even be bothered with a man to help him around the set. "It seems so silly," says Bill, "for a healthy man to be constantly shadowed by a male maid carrying a powder puff. I'm still strong enough to carry my own makeup mirror, and I can get into a coat all right by myself."

All of which will probably torch some of Hollywood's best known stars.

You Asked Me and I'm Telling You! Pauline McComas, Minneapolis; Greta Garbo has been making pictures in Hollywood for 19 years; Marlene Dietrich only five. La Garbo came over in the summer of 1925 and went into a picture called "The Torrent." She made 10 more silent films and then, 10 talks. Twenty-one pictures in all. Dietrich, starts with "Morocco" and is now making her eighth talkie for Paramount. Oddly enough, it's the first time she and Gary Cooper have played together since "Morocco."

At her own request, Margaret Lindsay is rehearsing with the 46 chorines Bobby Connolly is training for "Colleen." The level headed Margaret figures that the quickest way to fame is to be a hit in a musical. Warners have promised her an opportunity, so she is learning to dance the whirlwind routines that Hollywood requires of its chorus girls.

For years, Jerry and Mae Howard (ex Ted Healy stogee) have been trying to get their parents to move to California, but the old folks have always been nervous about earthquakes. Even the promise of a house wouldn't budge them. Then came the Brooklyn quake the other day.

The next morning, Jerry and Mae got a wire: "Buy that house. We're on our way."

HOLLYWOOD TICKER-TAPE—

Ida Lupino has tossed off a song called "Out of the Thought Game You." It will be offered to radio and orchestra uses soon.

Times must be picking up. Constance Bennett, who is shrewd about her money, is erecting a business building on her Sunset Boulevard property.

The Clover club, one of the smartest of the local night spots, is open again after a number of weeks of darkness. Recommended for stay-up-laters, George Givot's impersonations of Harry Richman at the King's club. . . . Cleo Brown's piano madness at the Century club. . . . Now that Harpo Marx refuses to give up his European trip, Groucho may take a 39-day trip to Peru. . . . Bing Crosby's horse, "Friend Andy," racing at Santa Anita this season, is named after Andy Devine. . . . And, speaking of racing, Jean Harlow may buy an interest in the J. Walter Rubens-Spencer Tracy stables.

DID YOU KNOW— That Mae West once played "Little Lord Fauntleroy" for the Hal Clarrendon stock company in Brooklyn's Bushwick section?
