VISITIN' THE NEIGHBORS

By "CHES" MATTHEWS

From Bald headed row a fellow is s'posed to have the best view of the show you know. We've been to see a most interesting show this week and what a lot of bald heads were there ahead of us:

The rows of bald, smooth heads were those of smiling hills, though, and the show made up of the plump sleek acres of Jonathan's Creek Valley.

We don't know where else there are so many carefully rounded hill tops—some of them have a "ruffle" of trees around their "necks," but most of them are bare of everything except thick grass carpeting and "hamburgers on the hoof."

The advance of the marching hills was halted along both sides of the mirror clear stream, by the broad flat fields of Jonathan Creek farms. Not only are the hills pushed back but they're all in service for the conquering farmers. They're the pastures for the fattest cattle in the country side and when those cattle are brought down in the late fall there will be no necessity for rationing their food if we're any judge of the contents of fat corn shocks, bulging silos and rows of hay stacks.

And what numbers of potential pumpkin pies we saw scattered over the fields. And how many sausages grunting in their pens.

We didn't know there was a stretch of road so level in all Haywood county as the new one from Dellwood to Cove Creek. If a highway has a personality we'd say this one is suave and sophisticated. And with good reason. We'd even concede it the right to smirk complacently because it's a very super sector it traverses.

Probably the oldest settlement in the section, we're told (with lands far more productive now than in their youth). The quaint old mill wheel at Cove Creek has turned for more than a hundred years and the population of the valley is directly descended from those who first plowed its deep soil.

At the meeting of the waters of Jonathan's Creek and Cove Creek we went snooping off to the right, on a dirt road which two affable, neighborly gentlemen whittling by a store building told us it was "travelable 'cept when it rains." Oh, oh! And are we glad 'twasn't raining!

It was insignificant as to size and uncertain as to disposition, that road, but we wouldn't have missed its meanderings for anything because they led us right up into the company of the bald heads—and what marvelous views of the low lands below. The broad velvety field, laced through with silver. Decorated with well kept homes from whose chimneys smoke curled heavenward—against a background of soft green hills. It was lovely!

The further we wandered the straighter the hills stood, with the little road hanging on and little houses tucked into the folds of their rougher texture for a few miles but with a gorgeous perspective of the distant hills and valleys from every peek between the trees.

As the road began to get its breath again and the valley reaches up to welcome us we are back on gravel and conscious of more spring houses than I think we could count. One, if you please, was just a building stooped down under a huge rock—most of them were rock bordered and don't you bet the ice man would hate to travel that route in search of customers!

Soon a river bridge and we knew by the odiferous foam 'twas the Pigeon again. If you traveled all the roads in the county how many times do you imagine you'd cross Pigeon River? Bet we'd need an adding machine to "figger."

Anyway, there 'twas and we came, meeting it for miles then, Crabtree—the highway again and back through hills that are always a picture. Past many homes we knew and several that are just coming into being. Good looking too!

Don't go the high road on a rainy day but don't miss it when it's dry. The full beauty of the Jonathan's Creek community is most appreciated from that elevation. However, whatever the day

Sam Arrington Gives History of F. F. A.

The history and progress of the F. F. A. movement in Haywood was the general subject of Sam Arrington, who has just returned from the national convention in Kansas City.

Sam pointed out the work had developed many boys into becoming farmers. He was most complimentary of the leadership of their instructor, J. C. Brown, who later gave a few points on the work.

Among the outstanding highlights in the work, he said, was the practical application of the work to what a boy had available, and not to force the work on the boy, but to let him choose to do those things which he liked best.

or the mood of the weather man a drive down the smooth, level way through the valley itself will pay big dividends of pleasure.

Said our informant by the mill race "You could travel hereabouts a year, straight, and always find something new to see." We concur. Do you mind our bubbling over to you all about what we see?

The long tables at which the 60 guests were seated were arranged in Hallow'e'en decorations, the latter also being used in the ballroom of the hotel where dancing was enjoyed following the serving of supper and the program of the evening.
