Minor Defects Of Rejected Men To Be Corrected

Carrying out President Roosevelt's request for rehabilitation of selective service registrants having remediable physical defects which now disqualify them for military training, National Selective headquarters will begin its program with treatment of approximately 200,000 men who have minor defects, it was learned this week from the local office of the draft board.

Although all the regulations relative to the program have not been drafted in entirety, National headquarters has indicated that the first men to be rehabilitated will be those whose defects can be corrected in the easiest and most economical way. Complete details of the program will be announced soon.

As far back as last May, Brig. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, director of selective service, said that the physical condition of this country's youth is something of which we nationally should thoroughly be ashamed and predicted that the day would come when there would be widespread objection to allowing men to escape military training because of some minor remediable defect.

About 50 per cent of the approximately two million registrants who have been examined for induction into the army of the United States under the selective training have been disqualified because of physical, mental or educational reasons.

The plan is for civilian practitioners to rehabilitate the men in their communities. The program will be under the local board members and the physicians and dentists assigned to the local boards.
