When he first came into town, he was met with such cordiality that it, in a way, completely went to his head. He was something very new and his rapturous captivation of every one with whom he came into contact. For a while he gloried in the fact that he was so different, so unlike the others. Then, suddenly, he realized that his likeness to a richer cousin was proving decidedly embarrassing. He found that hands extended in welcome were withdrawn, and a very evident air of disgust was too noticeable to be ignored.

He thought the matter over and decided that this similarity might be overcome if he lost some of his shining appearance. He became careless and assumed a dingy complexion. But that made matters much worse, anger took the place of disgust and he had to listen to words not only uncomplimentary but decidedly profane. Each day found him more and more unpopular; found that people who once sought his company now shunned him, turned him over to others with a sigh of relief. Perhaps, his greatest sorrow was the knowledge that he was mistaken for that (by now) hated cousin. Lower and lower he grew in the esteem of everyone, consequently his opinion of himself shrunk to the lowest degree and he prayed that he might retire from public view.

Evidently this idea was in the mind of his parents for they announced they, too, were ashamed of him and were disowning him forever. From now on their children would be in a class to themselves, dark and sturdy. They would stand in bold relief against the world and would never be mistaken for any one else, but would make their own way in the world. In fact, as far as they were concerned, the sooner they forgot their other off-spring they (and everyone else) would be very much happier. They would like to bury their fair-haired child in forgetfulness and say no more about the matter.

If there be a moral in this tale, (which there isn't the faintest indication of being) it might show that it never pays to feel your own importance too much. Sooner or later you'll find that some one can step right into your place and fill it far more acceptably; find a welcome that you have rubbed off the front door mat by too much walking over others and get pushed completely out of circulation just like the little isolationist of this story.

Poor, little white penny!

The health of the "Civilian Soldiers" on the home front can hasten or retard America's victory. In one day, the common cold results in the loss of enough man-hours to build a cruiser. Guard against this enemy and all the other seasonal ills that are so costly to production—and to the individual. Keep your medicine chest filled with these tried and proven health needs—quality-tested in the laboratory—quality-proven by daily use in millions of homes.
