Movie Scenes Of Life In Jail Very Realistic

HOLLYWOOD (UP)—For anyone who's been inside a jail or insane asylum, a new movie coming out will be completely realistic.

Whether the story about Claudette Colbert and Robert Ryan bears any resemblance to real life is open to question. But RKO gives assurance that the jail they're in does.

A small army of technical advisers has been working feverishly to insure that no jailbirds will be able to complain about the authenticity of "The Secret Fury". This thriller goes from court rooms, psychiatrists' offices, jails and county offices to an insane asylum.

Two superior court judges and a bailliff gave the producers advice for a sequence in which Miss Colbert goes on trial for murder.

"I'm tired of seeing judges hammer a gavel whenever anything happens in a movie court room," one movie-going judge said. "A judge never has a gavel on hand, because he almost never needs one in an actual court session."

Uses His Fist

Judges nearly always need gavels in movie court sessions, and this movie is no exception. So the movie justice now bangs on his bench with his fist.

The court room fight in this picture is between Ryan, playing a material witness, and Paul Kelly, a badgering prosecuting attorney.
Ryan jumps down and takes a poke at Kelly.

Another judge and the producer's attorney agreed that this was contempt of court. They wrote a $100 fine for Ryan into the script.
An assistant police chief and a co-operative jailer furnished more help on the jail sequences.
The movie man had Miss Colbert dragged to her cell by a big policeman.

Policewomen, not men, the officials pointed out, handle women lawbreakers.

Brain Test Shown

The technical advisers also led the movie makers to include another "authentic" scene in their work. They show Miss Colbert getting a brain examination to determine a possible basis for her crime.

The examination is known as an electroencephalogram, a record of brain waves which reveals pathology in the brain. The process was
