HOLLYWOOD—"The Good Humor Man" will wear you out just looking at its frantic efforts to be funny. Once in a while its atomic slapstick is good for a guffaw. In between it labors along with a murder-robbery plot that could only have been hatched in a producer's nightmare.

When the slapstick finally gets to hitting, it is at least as strenuous as that of "The Fuller Brush Man". (Both pictures came from the same studio and had the same producer, S. Sylvan Simon.) This time it's Jack Carson as a stupid, good-hearted ice-cream-bar ped-ler whose favorite reading is comic books.

On his rounds, he is halted by a shapely blonde (Jean Wallace) in a darkened house. Fearing gangsters, she asks him to guard her overnight. Jack nails planks over the doors and windows and sprinkles flour over the floors (as his comic book hero would) to track any intruders. He spends the night on the davenport in one of her frilly nightgowns.

Next morning she lies apparently strangled. Jack decides he is a murderer but can't convince the police of this. But meanwhile a factory is robbed, and he is suspected of this crime. To clear himself on this count, he starts with his sweetheart (Lola Albright) on a mad chase for the crooks.

He swings by the neck on a playground acrobatic ring and knocks down enemies with his feet. A teeter-totter tosses him up into a basketball hoop. A geography-class globe three feet in diameter falls over his head, and he cavorts around in battle like some weird monster. A buzz saw chases him and Lola around the school woodshop and finally saws the floor out from under them. They and the crooks fall into the gym swimming pool, where the saw pursues them. The chase ends in the auditorium with scores of small boys—Jack's pals—throwing baseballs and pies at the villains.

One funny touch is at the picture's start—Jack's head ringing with the sound of his truck's bells till even customers seem to speak in the racket. The funniest slapstick has Carson playing a trombone with a crook's head inside its curve while Lola crashes cymbals in time against another meanie's ears. On the whole, though, this picture adds up to the year's least result for the most effort.
