Priest Building Boys' Town In Cotton Patch

By BURNS BENNETT
United Press Staff Correspondent

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (UP)—Father Michael Caswell is a sincere, Kentucky-born young priest whose dream is taking rude shape in an Alabama cotton patch.

A squat, stucco building with its tiny white cross in the center of a 120-acre tract some 10 miles from Montgomery is the first structure in what Father Michael hopes will be a boys town for Negroes.

Although the project started only last summer, already 12 young Negroes are working and living at the little settlement dedicated to Our Lady of Fatima.

Father Caswell was born in Louisville 40 years ago. He studied at Passionist Order schools in Cincinnati, Detroit, and Chicago. Most of his church career has been spent working with the underprivileged.

Inspired by Boy
It was in Birmingham 10 years ago that the door of his home burst open and a Negro boy threw himself into Caswell's arms, crying, "I don't want to live any more. I want to die."

His story turned the young priest's attention to the need of Negro youth in the south. With the permission of the bishop, Father Caswell purchased a site on the Atlanta highway, between Montgomery and Mt. Meigs.

Before the foundation was laid, Father Caswell began to receive applications. Today the main building is still raw and unfinished inside. Its tar paper partitions are to be plastered. But they are already in use.

The structure will have nine rooms, including two large dormitory sections. Each of the latter already quarters six boys.

There is one large general assembly room. There the boys eat, study, and play. It is equipped with a pingpong table, a battered old radio and some rickety furniture, all donated. The tiny chapel where worship services are held each morning is spotless.

Some Livestock
The boys range between 14 and 16 years. They have their own garden. They divide up the chores, which include care of the single cow, some chickens, four or five pigs, and two goats, all gifts of people who have learned of the project.

A beautiful creek winds through the property. It will come in handy when they get the additional live stock, which Father Michael is confident will be received.

A nearby area line supplies power. They also have a well dug but residents at the home still use outdoor plumbing.

Out front, between the school and the highway, is another fine plot.

"There," says Father Michael, "will stand our beautiful church."

Science Is Ready For Polio Now

By PAUL F. ELLIS
United Press Science Editor
NEW YORK (UP)—The battle lines are drawn for the 1950 battle against polio.

Whether the disease strikes in the fury it did in 1949 cannot be forecast, but the indications are that it may, perhaps even more so in the matter of the number of cases.

However, the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis reports that an unprecedented number of doctors, nurses and physical therapists are being trained to cope with polio in the 1950 season.

Dr. Hart E. Van Riper, medical director of the foundation, said polio epidemics are unpredictable but that so far this year the number of cases reported exceeds the incidence during the same period in 1949.

Despite Higher Incidence, Better Patient Care Seen

Dr. Van Riper said that despite "what might be considered a pessimistic outlook as to incidence, prospects for improved patient care in 1950 are good—in fact, better than ever before."

He pointed out that preparations for expert care wherever polio may strike his summer "are being stepped up tremendously" across the country.

The program is being accomplished, he said, through a series of polio institutes, teaching conferences, short-term courses and workshops for medical personnel sponsored by the March of Dimes organization.

"This year," Van Riper said, "no community is waiting until outbreaks occur. Mindful of last year's disastrous experience, state and district health departments and hospital authorities are going all-out to assure a nucleus of polio-trained medical personnel should outbreaks develop in their areas."

Virtually All States Have Polio Courses

Van Riper reported that before the summer ends, almost every state will have offered at least one polio course for all medical personnel concerned with the treatment of polio patients.

He said that in Oklahoma, for instance, more than 500 nurses and 150 physicians attended five two-day institutes held there to familiarize medical personnel with the diagnosis and modern treatment of polio and its specialized nursing requirements.

In addition, smaller scale institutes and training courses have been held or are now being planned for California, Arizona, Idaho, Kentucky, Wyoming, Wisconsin and Texas.

Van Riper said New Mexico and Virginia recently concluded statewide seminars for nurses, and that in Illinois, where two polio institutes already have been held for nurses, several six-week courses are now in progress for nurses in other parts of the state.

Last year 52,375 persons were stricken with polio. The number reported has been increasing in recent years, partly because doctors are developing better diagnostic methods.
