

New Booklet For Beginners Gives Sports Tips

CHICAGO — To help youngsters learn the fundamentals of various sports, a series of four new booklets has been published under the direction of The Athletic Institute. This non-profit organization has obtained the services of some top monitors in their fields as consultants. The four sports in the series are baseball, basketball, bowling and tennis.

This "How to Improve" series starts with the basic fundamentals of each sport and carries through to the most minute details. Each booklet is profusely illustrated so that the lessons are also visual.

The consultants for the baseball book are Dick Seibert, baseball coach at the University of Minnesota, and Otto H. Vogel, coach at the University of Iowa.

The tennis book adviser is Harry (Cap) Leighton, coach at a Chicago

Fantastic Movies Remain Just That

By GENE HANDSAKER

HOLLYWOOD—Brace yourself, moviegoers, for a couple of real weirdies.

"The Day the Earth Stood Still" lands a flying saucer from another planet on the public lawn in Washington, D. C. "When Worlds Collide" smashes dear old Mother Earth to bits in a cataclysmic high school as well as for a local tennis club.

The bowling booklet's consultants are Ned Day, former world's individual match game champion, and Malton Raymer, executive secretary of the American Junior Bowling Congress.

Advisers for the basketball booklet are Dr. Forrest C. (Phog) Allen, coach at Kansas; Harold E. (Bud) Foster, coach at Wisconsin; and Eddie Hickey, coach at St. Louis U.

Neither of these fantasies, thank the still stable heavens, is very convincing. From the saucer steps a tall, slender, super-intelligent gent, Klaatu, played by Britain's Michael Rennie, who was Jean Simmons' lover in "Trio". With him is a mechanical monster that squirts a ray that disintegrates guns, tanks, and men.

Klaatu wants to warn earthlings to confine their warring to this planet or be destroyed by more advanced spheres. But world leaders are too busy squabbling to convene and listen. So Klaatu escapes from a hospital, posing as "Mr. Carpenter" in a well-fitting, stolen suit, to study humans. Finally, to demonstrate his power, he turns off electricity all over the earth for 30 minutes.

He has learned to speak English

Hallowe'en Harvest At Meredith

Catherine James and Bess Francis, both of Waynesville, join in the fun at Meredith College as the ninth annual Corn Huskin' Bee is celebrated. Among the events are hog calling contests, tall story sessions, and, yes, corn husking. Miss James serves as folk dance chairman.

and Rennie admirably keeps his British accents from getting too broad by monitoring earth's radio. But how he has learned to read the language—or for that matter, perform simpler feats like tying a four-in-hand tie—isn't explained.

He meets sympathetic Patricia Neal, her admiring son (Billy Gray), and her annoyed suitor (Hugh Marlowe). Not even the brief appearances of Drew Pearson, Gabriel Heatter, H. V. Kaltenborn, and Elmer Davis, at their microphones, giving the lowdown on the space man, will make you believe all this is really happening.

Producer George Pal has slipped some with his second rocket trip into space. The first, "Destination Moon," looked to a layman as if it could conceivably take place some day. The second, "When Worlds Collide," looks more like science-fiction hokum and is cluttered by a routine love triangle.

The film is concerned with getting a rocket built and stocked with humans, animals, and seeds for colonizing another planet before the celestial collision.

Involved are Richard Derr, Barbara Rush, Peter Hanson, John Hoyt, and Larry Keating. The picture is based on a novel by Edwin Balmer and Philip Wylie.
