Overflow Crowd Donates $1,100 At Fines Creek Homecoming

By MRS. HUGH FERGUSON

A large crowd attended the annual Decoration and Homecoming services Sunday at the Fines Creek Memorial Baptist Church. There were several visitors from Tennessee and other parts of North Carolina. The crowd was well fed, and fellowship was enjoyed by all. The day brought back many recollections by the elderly folks who were the founders of Fines Creek, and we often wonder if we can fill their places.

The Rev. J. B. Mull, pastor, brought the morning message, with an attendance of 275. A big crowd that overflowed the church heard as guest speaker in the afternoon, Mr. Cass Walker, of Knoxville, Tenn. His brief talk was inspiring and helpful to both young and old. Mr. Walker emphasized that as long as we know right, we must keep pressing onward in spite of criticism.

Contributions or pledges toward the indebtedness of the church amounted to $1,100, and another donation is expected by the first of the year. The church is looking forward to the day that they can hold dedication services.

A musical program was presented by the Memorial Baptist Church Choir. Joe Clarke, as their leader, led the congregation in several hymns. Other singers taking part were the Ball City Church Choir Mrs. Fred Brown, Mrs. Conan Haynes, and Miss Norma Clarke. Mrs. N. H. Clarke was the pianist.

The community held a business session, and three trustees were elected for the church cemetery: F. D. Brummett, Carl Greene, and Cauley Rogers.

PARENT PROBLEMS

Once a Youngster's Punished, Don't Keep Him in Disgrace

By GARRY CLEVELAND MYERS, Ph.D.
SUPPOSE you have had occasion to punish your five or six-year-old child just before mealtime. Suppose as the family assembles for dinner, all are unusually quiet for several minutes around the table. It's clear to all that the punished child feels he is in disgrace.

It seems a year to him since anybody has smiled or spoken cheerfully. He ventures to look up at his mother, but she's looking down. He wants so much to see a smile on his father's face or hear him speak a tender word, but he doesn't. Even the dog senses that all is not well. At last the baby sister says, "Bad boy." This is the human way in such a situation, but, oh, so very cruel.

Reminded of Misdeeds
Suppose your daughter, ten, knowing she should be home from the neighbor's at seven o'clock, doesn't arrive till nearly eight. You announce a penalty—denial of her favorite TV or radio program that evening at eight. At her bedtime at eight-thirty you remind her of a number of her earlier misdeeds and shortcomings, even adding a few more of them as you kiss her good night.

Had she known beforehand she would forfeit the program on the air if she came home late, she might have felt the punishment just, if only it had ended with the announced penalty. Perhaps this little girl cried herself to sleep.

while wondering whether her mother would bring the matter up again the next morning or the following evening. We hope she didn't.

Many parents believe that after they punish a child, they should explain in great detail why they did, and then force the child to say he's sorry and promise never to repeat the offense. Sometimes the parent then will add warnings and go into long and boring exhortations.

Make Reason Clear
Unless you are very sure the reason he's being punished is clear to the child, why punish him in the first place? Choose for punishment only those instances very obvious to the child. This is especially important with the youngster under three or four, when he sometimes should be punished on the first offense without warning. With the older child, a safe way, as a rule, is to define clearly the particular offense and its seriousness and announce the penalty should it be repeated, making sure to keep your word.

You may say this is a threat. It is, but if wisely made and faithfully carried out, it may keep him from choosing to repeat the offense and keep him out of further trouble. Besides, it will seem fair to him.

Anyway, try to stick to the rule that after the specific punishment is completed, end the matter then.
