(Continued from Page 2) solved it in a masterly manner. "Here's the information about the next scrappers," said the pro-

Feeling much better than I had a few minutes before, I took the piece of paper, climbed up on the platform again, grabbed hold of the ropes and stooped over in order to pass through.

And I'll be dog-goned if every single one of those pins didn't pop out. That chap in the dressing room might have been all right as an attendant of prize-fighters but as a pants pinner sure

Anyway, there I was, in an even more embarrassing position than I had been before. Some of those pin-points were altogether too close for comfort. However, so far as the general public was concerned, nobody seemed to have observed my pre-dicament. It wasn't until the third bout that some wise guy in the third or fourth row let out a joyous shout: "Hey, Carl; look at your pants!"

I paid no attention "Your pants, Carl! They're split from stem to stern!"

And then another guy, sitting close by the first chump, took up the cry. In a moment or two, all of the front rows were making un-appreciated remarks about my raiment, Unappreciated so far as I was concerned anyway.

I don't know of anything that is more embarrassing than to be standing on a raised platform. directly underneath a powerful electric light, and have a bunch of fools calling the attention of the world at large to the fact that your patns are split. I don't know of any person-man or womanwho would appreciate it.

I pretended not to hear the raucous comments of the hoodlums in the audience, but the more I tried to ignore them the more ribald they became in their conduct. Finally I left the ring and informed the promoter that so far as any further announcements were concerned, I was through for the evening.

And I was, too, Not only for that evening, but for good, because that was the last time I ever acted as announcer at a prize
