PARENT PROBLEMS

Foster Child Will Need A Happy Family Circle

By GARRY CLEVELAND MYERS, Ph.D.

IT'S not easy to be a good parent to an adopted child.

A Pennsylvania mother who adopted a girl of six writes:

"She was adopted less than a year ago. She learns fast but she won't mind and is very stubborn. When I tell her she can't do something, she cries. I thought I had lots of patience but now it seems I'm losing it all.

"I try to be good to her. I take her shopping with me, buy her things. But when my husband or I shout at her, she says we don't like her. She also has a difficult time getting along with other children.

"She seems to want a lot of attention, something I think she never had before. Everybody in our family thinks the world of her. We make a fuss over her beauty and rave about her naturally curly hair.

"She is nervous and chews her nails."

This was my reply:

It's wonderful that you have provided a loving home for this child. I'm sure you try hard to do your best in caring for her. Let her know you are not her real mother, but bring her up as if you were.

I'm glad you take her places with you. But you probably give her too much and put too much trust in material things. The relatives dote on her but don't contribute much to help cultivate her desirable traits.

Effective Method

Naturally, she supposes you and

Dad don't love her when you shout at her. Perhaps you shout because you have not thought out an effective method of controlling her.

When she must be punished for some specific bad act, assign her to sit unmuzzed for exactly 30 minutes. Cut down on bossing and commanding. Except for a few regular chores, avoid commands. Try to make your commands a request.

Try to be more gentle and affectionate, listen attentively to what she says and show appreciation for her good behavior and achievements.

When she brings playmates home, study her and try to guide her in being a gracious hostess. Ask your relatives to treat her in a less childish manner, to avoid praising her for her attractive physical traits. Instead, praise her goodness and achievements resulting from her own efforts. Try to remember that she's a precious person and not a plaything for anyone's amusement.

Read to Her

Read to her and make things with her. Encourage her as soon as possible to read to a much younger child in the neighborhood. As you become more serene yourself and provide her with a calm and happy family atmosphere, her nail-chewing should gradually subside.

(My bulletins "Stubbornness" and "Nail-Biting" may be had by sending a self-addressed, stamped envelope to me in care of this newspaper.)
