DECORATING WITH PANELS OF LIGHT

A new and interesting decorative light treatment is seen in panels of light—whole walls and ceilings, and all on an easy-to-make basis.

Walls of light and ceilings of light are created with a combination of fluorescent fixtures and tubes, and translucent vinyl plastic. The fluorescent fixtures and tubes, which come in multi-lengths and wattages, are installed on wall or ceiling 18 to 24 inches apart, depending on the required light intensity. Your local electrical dealer can provide the fixtures with a hand switch; the tubes come in a variety of tones, both warm and cool.

When the fixtures are installed, a simple framework is built about 6 inches away from them. Either staple sheets of plastic to the back of this framework, or use the following method:

Make an additional framework of thin molding, 1/4 or 1/2 inch, then staple the plastic sheets to this construction. Use screws rather than nails to mount it on your built-in framework. This latter method will enable you to remove the panel for later replacement of fluorescent tubes. Decorative sheets of translucent plastic are available at most art material stores and arts and hobby shops.

Ceilings of light are a good selection for dark hallways, and walls of light are an excellent type of installation for closets. Consider walls and ceilings of light, too, for renovated attics or in basements where there may be ugly pipes which can be concealed behind the lighted panels.
