Rotarians Hear Program On Stock Market

"Investment is an individual matter," Dave Bailey, stock and bond specialist, told Rotarians here Friday. "There is a right stock for every person; a stock suitable to one person is not suitable to another," he said.

"It is something like going to a doctor and asking if he has any good medicine. A good medicine for you might be just the opposite what the next patient needs," he said in making the comparison.

In the same line of thinking, he warned against "self appraisal" of stocks by an individual. "Get the assistance of experts, the same as when you find an operation is needed you seek a specialist, and do not try to perform the operation yourself. This is the age of specialists and research."

Bailey said that if the high level of business continues, that it will be necessary to raise billions of capital for expansion purposes.

"Business today is too big for one or two individuals to underwrite," he said.

Many people do not understand market fluctuations, the speaker said. He gave an illustration of posting the market price of your home daily, and said the difference of the daily price would be far greater than the stock market. "The stock market is far tamer than the price of your home," he continued.

He cited many terms, and conditions which must be met for persons to operate on the New York Stock Exchange. He defined terms frequently used in the stock market, and spent some time in a question and answer period.
