Two Signs Honor Great Smoky Park Conservationists

Two new signs in the Great Smoky Mountains National Park have been erected near Newfound Gap to commemorate men whose activities focused local and national interest upon this area, according to the National Park Service. One of them is Charles A. Webb of Asheville and the other is Ben A. Morton of Knoxville, Tenn.

The sign honoring Mr. Webb is located approximately six miles from the gap, along the spur road to Clingman's Dome, at a point where a superb view of forested mountain ranges is to be had. This sign, about three-fourths of a mile beyond Collins Gap, reads as follows:

Webb Overlook
Named for Charles A. Webb (1866-1949), prominent civic leader, conservationist and newspaper publisher of Asheville, North Carolina. His interest and activity helped to establish Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

The second sign, entitled "Morton Overlook," is approximately three-fourths of a mile below Newfound Gap on the Tennessee side of the highway. It is a place where thousands of park visitors stop to photograph the spectacular gorge of the Little Pigeon River. This sign reads as follows:

Morton Overlook
Named for Ben A. Morton (1875-1952), civic leader and conservationist of Knoxville, Tennessee. He worked hard to assure the preservation of the Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

Clean-Up Week Opens In Clyde

Mayor Gerald Fish today announced the official opening of "Clean-Up Week" in Clyde, with town officials and others cooperating in the drive.

It is hoped that a number of store fronts will be painted during the week, he said, and work is already under way on several homes.

The town's garbage truck will make special pick-ups for persons who request the service from the Town Hall. All trash and garbage should be put out ready for the truck's arrival, he said.
