Advertisement for 'Beach Beauty' suntan oil. Features a woman in a swimsuit. Text: 'BEACH BEAUTY... New suntan oil may be sprayed on, avoiding stickiness, preserving the well-groomed look. By VIVIAN BROWN AP Newsfeatures Beauty Editor. IT'S A GOOD IDEA to use a suntan product that is for your own type. Blondes like a honey tan, a gentle shade. Brunettes may choose a squaw or coppery brown tone in lotion or cream to coat their epidermis. Then convenience should be considered. If oily lotion is preferred, you'll be pleased to note these are now available in aerosol cans—no more messy hands, stains on clothes or perfumed picnic fare. Your hands will stay clean so that sand and grass will not cling to them. Non-oily lotions still are available for those who like a carefree tan. A tanning foam that is sprayed from a can offers an added ingredient that smooths normally dry skin. There is a greaseless tanning cream that contains body lotion treatment also. There are sun-proofing products too for those who can't take any sun—sensitive or allergic types need to choose it if they'd block out ultra-violet rays. It is greaseless and odorless. One new liquid burn-aid is said to be the first healing, antiseptic liquid that sprays away sunburn pain, so you do not need to touch sunburned areas. The important point about sun concoctions is that you should not be too eager to get your tan even though you wear sun protection. Give yourself time and plan your exposures so that you build up your tan gradually. If your skin starts to peel in the middle of your vacation because you've charred the outer layer of skin, it will defeat your entire beauty aim for summer. After the peeled skin is fluffed off, it will take awhile to build up a nice smooth tan again. By that time the summer may be over and you will not have gained much by trying to rush things along.'
