PARENT PROBLEMS

Getting Acquainted With The New Baby

By GARRY CLEVELAND MYERS, Ph.D.

WE parents and grandparents know what a newborn baby is like. But not many parents of a first child have had any experience with new babies.

Dr. Katharine M. Wolfe of the Child Study Center, Yale University, and Aline B. Auerbach give a delightful word-picture of the brand new baby in their booklet, "As Your Child Grows: The First Eighteen Months." (It can be obtained from The Child Study Association of America, 132 E. 74th Street, New York City, for 40 cents.)

Wrinkled Bodies

"Newborn infants are not only smaller than parents expect, they often look like puny, thin, little old men or women. They have red and very wrinkled bodies and faces, thin heads and ears sometimes covered with long, thin black hair."

Having been accustomed to his snug, warm place, he suddenly meets lights and changes of temperature and support. He reacts to light, to sound, to touch, to taste and to change of position and temperature, but doesn't move or respond as any other human being does or with any obvious purpose. His responses are unpredictable.

If you touch a baby's cheek, he may kick his leg, make a fist or start to suck—or he may not respond at all.

Loud Noises

Sometimes the newborn baby will respond with displeasure or shock to cold, loud noises, strong light or sudden loss of support. When his equilibrium is disturbed, he may react by an increase of activity or by crying or both.

To the mother and father, the baby may at first seem so tiny and fragile "they are afraid he may break if they touch him." But they soon find this little creature more tough and sturdy than they thought and they gain the courage to handle him as seems necessary.

They learn, too, that he is not so hard to pick up. As they relax their bodies and arms, the baby shows them the position he prefers.

"There are no rules here so important as to do what seems right for each parent and each child," say the authors.

Whether breast-fed or bottle-fed, it's the baby's closeness to the mother's body as she holds him tenderly that is of prime importance. It is very different from propping the bottle on a pillow while feeding him.

Important to Learn

"It is essential for a baby to learn that a human being is associated with his greatest satisfaction or with his greatest relief, the loss of hunger."

He learns this by being exposed as much as possible, not only to the feel of his mother's body but also to the sight of her face as she feeds him.

Wife Preservers

We have been told that cooking vegetables in too much water wastes their vitamin content. However, in very humid weather it is advisable to use more water than in dry weather when boiling foods, then watch to see that the water does not boil away and scorch the food.
