Woman U. S. Meat Inspector Relates Her Unusual Career

By JANE EADS

WASHINGTON—Mrs. Ruby L. Cotham, recently retired after more than 37 years as one of the federal government's few women meat inspectors, says her unglamorous but absorbing job brought her into contact with every known hog product except the squeal.

The doughty and genial Alabama-born Mrs. Cotham, now living here with her brother, a government accountant, and his wife, began her career on the killing floor at the East St. Louis, Ill., stockyards in October 1918.

"It was a horrible job but useful, and I needed work," she said. "I kept learning and studying and finally was sent to New Orleans, where I got off killing and into sausage, lard and shortening. Just before I retired I got into fried pork skins."

There was nothing agreeable about all this, Mrs. Cotham concedes. Her work outfit consisted of slacks, a white frock, hat and shoes spotlessly clean, and no nail polish. It was hard physical work, she said, but gratifying.

"Federal meat inspectors protect the public, honey," she explained. "We never let anything get out of the house I wouldn't eat myself with relish."

For 12 years, Mrs. Cotham worked in a New Orleans lard refinery
