

So This Is New York

By NORTH CALLAHAN

Eugene van Wyck has travelled 1 1/2 million miles in his lifetime. He told me, and says that never has the white man's reputation been so low with Asiatics as it is now. This applies to Egypt and the Middle East as well. Eugene, a genial Dutch native of South Africa is an official of the Swedish American Lines here and makes a trip around the world almost every year. There is definitely not one world, but two, he says, the Eastern and the Western and he has the Kipling-like attitude that never the twain shall meet. India, for instance, he pointed out, is only a third the area of the U. S., yet has three times as many people. Average wage per man there is $47 a year, and thousands sleep outdoors because they have no houses in which to live. Second-rate American movies, the only kind they can afford, give the Indian people a wrong idea of our life, and make them shy away from us as well as from Communism. Yet India is a powerful country. Eugene emphasized to me, and Nehru is the only man in the world, he stated, to whom Nasser of Egypt will listen because the Indian prime minister is known to be unflinchingly neutral between East and West.

Stopped beside the sunken plaza in Rockefeller Center and noted that there, summer is taking a lingering goodbye. Along the picturesque length of the miniature gardens which touch 5th Avenue, iris and green shrubs still betoken the fading signs of summer, while the little copper merman, relentlessly ride the spouting fish down to the low section where Prometheus statuesquely holds his precious fire aloft. In the plaza, summery-looking sets of tables and huge umbrellas for the visiting diners were completely deserted, and pigeons gliding on the breezes caused by the surrounding skyscrapers seemed to whisper that summer is over and the whole scene would soon be changed.

When Jeter Oakley lived in North Carolina, he was known as one of the best automobile drivers between Gastonia and Statesville. And now that he has come to New York to live, he figured he was equally as capable. In fact, he told his young son, Stanley, so, in no uncertain terms. They were driving in from their suburb to Manhattan. But as the Oakley car turned into 8th Avenue near Madison Square Garden for which they were headed, Jeter found he was going the wrong way on a one-way street. He quickly turned the car around, almost knocked over a fire-plug while doing so, then with red face he quickly drove off the avenue. A cop looked at him and just shook his head. So did son Stanley.

She's really a harmless-looking blonde girl, with a nice smile from glistening white teeth. But when she gets you into the dentist's chair, she does a complete personality change. First, she yanks open your mouth with all the delicacy of opening a can of sardines, then with a murderously-sharp, ice-pick-like instrument, she probes around your gums until you feel and act like a stuck pig. To allay the pain and blood, she then swabs out the mouth with some kind of salve-compound that seems much like window-putty, then she grinds a-way on the molars until you swear she once operated a jack-hammer or at least a riveting machine. This is followed by pulling razor-like floss between the teeth until your mouth is a thing of shreds and patches. But your teeth feel better, Buster — three days later that is! And she's said hereabouts to be a top-notch dental technician.

Sam Levenson, former school-teacher turned TV comic, allows that when he was a kid, he took his father a note from the teacher saying Sam had "signs of astigmatism" and his dad hit him. Sam also said that castor oil was then the "poor man's penicillin."
