Mrs. Woodrow Wilson Gets Her First Permanent Births

By JANE EADS

WASHINGTON—Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, widow of the World War I president, still the handsome, elegantly turned-out grand dame in her eighties, still actively interested in the important affairs of the day, admits she's just got her first "permanent."

She submitted to the hair-primping process rather reluctantly, in preparing to attend, as guest of honor, the tenth annual dinner of the National Trust for Historic Preservation, where a centennial tribute was paid to her late husband.

Attending the meeting were more than 300 architects, historians, garden club leaders, directors of historic house museums and other representatives of groups which founded the non-profit organization.

Not all the trust's sessions were taken up with speech-making and the reading of reports. The group was entertained at tea by Under Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. Randolph Burgess, and one day all got aboard buses to go to Fredericksburg, Va., where they visited Kenmore, the home of James Monroe; the Mary Washington House, and Monroe's law office where they sampled the former president's favorite beverage—whiskey sours.

Sen. John Kennedy (D-Mass) and his young wife, the beautiful former "Jackie" Bouvier, have put their historic country house in nearby McLean, Va., up for sale or lease and will move back to town when they return to the capital in January.

Mrs. Kennedy says that her husband is out of town so much and works such late hours on Capital Hill when he is here, that much as they love the country life and the historic surroundings, she thinks it more sensible to find a place in town.

Some Washington hostesses are beginning to put their telephone numbers on their invitations, in connection with the "R.S.V.P.", to make it easier and quicker for folks to accept or decline a bid to a brunch, a dinner, or the more informal shindigs. Protocol still demands a written reply to an official or a white-tie affair, however.

Dressed for Dinner

By VERA WINSTON

IN keeping with the richness of current fashion, fine silk emerges as a favorite fabric. Black peau de soie is used to excellent effect for a handsome dinner dress that should have quite a career. The yoke and long sleeves are of black imported lace. The frock has a charming bodice the slit at the top revealing the lace in a flattering manner. Fullness is achieved through the hips by means of a released tuck from the defined waist which dips to a V in back.
