economic nationalism and the desire of governments to improve agricultural conditions by using surplus farm products for the production of alcohol.

While all these factors have figured prominently in the introduction of alcohol as a motor fuel, in many countries it appears that the desire to relieve agriculturists has been the outstanding motive.

Invariably the movement has been supported by legislative action and in many countries state alcohol monopolies, or similar organizations have been made responsible for enforcement. Generally such legislation requires alcohol in percentages ranging up to 40 per cent to be mixed with gasoline, and invariably, the alcohol so used must be of domestic production. Mr. Concanon stated that most decrees which he has examined specify which type of motors or by whom such mixtures are to be used and lists exemptions such as racing cars, aeroplanes, etc.

The success of alcohol as a motor fuel has varied, it is pointed out. Some countries notably Germany, appear to have experienced considerable success. Others after experiments, have abandoned the idea, or modified requirements. Other countries have pronounced the scheme impractical after conducting investigations; and still others are at present framing laws designed to increase the use of alcohol blends as motor fuel.

LOW COST MAINTENANCE AND HIGH RESALE VALUE

● The first cost of the Ford V-8 is as low as it is possible to make it and still give you a high quality, modern automobile with the comfort, roominess and safety features—the performance, dependability and economy of the Ford V-8.

This inbuilt quality is evident in the very low cost of maintenance and operation of the Ford V-8. And throughout many thousands of miles of service, maintenance is kept to a minimum because Genuine Ford Parts and service are priced so much lower. In addition, upkeep is further reduced by the Ford policy of exchanging factory reconditioned units—even to the Ford V-8 engine—a big economy only Ford owners enjoy.

Ford quality again comes to light in the high resale value of the Ford V-8. The manufacturer may set the price of a new car but the public itself decides what it will pay for a used car.

And it is a very significant fact that the public has set a high resale price on Ford cars... The reason is simple. Precision-built of the finest quality materials, Ford cars last longer, and therefore the market for used Fords is always good.

What else can you buy that will give your family as much enjoyment as a new Ford V-8? What other car offers you so sound an investment? With your old car applied against the down payment you may have to pay no more than $8.00 a week to be driving a new Ford V-8 tomorrow. Just ask your nearest Ford dealer about the Authorized Ford Finance Plan... And remember, as you thrill to V-8 performance on the highway, that this is the most economical car to operate that Ford has ever built.
