civic officials and organizations in fighting the menace of fire. He pointed out that pamphlets are being distributed all over the State for the purpose of explaining the best means of fighting the fire hazard. These contain as simple check of stairs, basement, plumbing, heating, ventilation, attic, chimneys, fireplaces, lighting, power, garage, equipment and miscellaneous items. They also explain how homes can be modernized through the aid of FHA loans, repaired for the purpose of fighting the fire hazards.

Speaking of fire prevention week, Mr. Suter stated, "Many of the homes of today which were built a generation ago are not equipped with the safeguards against flames that are available in modern construction. The builders were as anxious as we are to do everything that might stay the ravages of the fire god, but their knowledge of what to do and how to do it and what measures should be taken were not as comprehensive as we now possess. Old homes are often fire hazards and the way to reduce the menace that thus hangs over them, if not eliminate it almost entirely, is to modernize the property. You can diminish fire hazards in your home by making repairs and improvements under the convenient terms of the modernization credit plan, fullest details of which can be obtained from an approved lending institution in your community or from the state FHA headquarters here."

Mr. Suter, whose home is in Rocky Mount at present, last week stepped into the acting directorship of the FHA, when Theodore B. Sumner, of Asheville, state director, resigned. It is expected that no new appointment for the head position in the office here will be made before October 15.

Tuesday the business mark of the North Carolina FHA office cleared the Million dollar mark. That represents the amount actually insured in loans in the state. Nearly another million is pending in tentative commitments, it was stated. More than half of the business has been insured in North Carolina since state headquarters were moved from Asheville here on July 15th of this year. Stating that the

Winter Hays Are Aid To Dairymen

Winter hays, grown as a cover crop, provide a good feed for cattle during the following spring and summer.

Moreover, a good supply of winter grown hay will keep dairymen from running out of roughage when dry weather cuts short the summer hay crops, says John Arrey extension dairyman at State College.

It has been found in experiments that when cows are fed liberally on good roughage and one-half a normal grain ration, milk production is only about 10 percent lower than when a full grain allowance is fed, Arrey pointed out.

Since roughage is so much cheaper than grain, he added, the dairyman can save more on his feed costs by feeding roughage than he will lose by the slight decrease in milk production.

Another advantage in winter hays is the fact that they can be grown between October and May, at a time when the land is not being used for cotton, tobacco, corn or other summer crops.

A good hay crop will protect the land in winter by checking erosion and leaching, Arrey added.

The best quality hay will be secured if it is cut while the cereals are in the milk stage.
