KEEPS FLOCK LAYING ALL THE WINTER

SAYS IT'S NOT HARD TO KEEP
CHICKENS LAYING REGULARLY THROUGH COLD WEATHER

Porter Bryan, Madison County poultryman, says it's not hard to keep chickens laying regularly through the cold weather months. It's mainly a matter of getting a flock of good birds and taking proper care of them, he told George Miller, Madison County agent of the State College extension service.

Bryan has a flock of 47 White Leghorn pullets which have been laying an average of three eggs per hen every four days this winter. During the month of December, the daily flock average was 36 eggs, and one day he got 43 eggs from the 47 chickens, he told Miller.

Last winter he remodeled his poultry house according to plans furnished by the extension service. The house provides for adequate ventilation, yet protects the birds from cold and drafts. It is comparatively easy to keep sanitary. He keeps broken oyster shells before the hens at all times, and on fair days he turns them out to pick up grit and find green feed. Every morning and evening he puts a fresh supply of lukewarm water in the drinking fountains.

In addition to the mash and grain feed, he gives the birds sour milk every day, and keeps the water fountain and feed hoppers scrupulously clean.

As a check to show him exactly what his birds are doing, and how much he is making off the flock, he keeps a record on all expenditures and cash receipts. What Bryan has done, any poultryman can do by raising only high quality birds and taking good care of them, Miller stated.

Continuous rains show the need for clearing streams and otherwise providing for better drainage throughout North Carolina, report thoughtful farmers.

Lettuce beds in New Hanover County have made excellent growth though farmers are reluctant to set the plants for fear of future cold weather.
