

WASHINGTON and Mine

In Washington Oct. 16.—Gone is the time when the President's words were the only news hope to reach. With the coming of Congress it is his ambition to determine to keep his words through this medium and to let the public have a clear idea of the White House. In our day there is little that can be done to keep the public informed about the White House, but the rate of official communication is always high. Always, whenever possible, I have to stay away of purely political subjects. Wherever and when I am forced to comment on such burning issues, I shall do so without bias. And it is safe to predict that there will be plenty of burning issues and lots of inflammable fat thrown into the political fire, which is bound to flare up even at the very beginning of the special session.

The President, in his radio address calling a special session of Congress Oct. 16, hurried over continental and highly explosive news back into the political hopper. For one thing the Nation shows a sign of grateful relief. Mr. Roosevelt seemingly was at last abandoned his fight for enlarging the Supreme Court. At least he avoided the subject, and this fact alone brings comfort, even to many of his former supporters. The reverberations and political delirium tremens caused by the appointment of Mr. Black seems to have finally resulted in calls for the coroner and undertaker to take charge of the corpse of what was once the President's court enlargement plan.

No reference was made concerning any plan for liberalizing old-age pension payments under the Social Security act. However, this one, and perhaps will come later. A hard fight is expected to develop in the House against the maximum hours and minimum wage bill which has already passed the Senate. The South does not want to see the nation toward the end of the year—and that is not a real one. At some conference, now in western trip, President Roosevelt still spontaneously indicated good cheer and fine humor, even literally to stay out from his role as the man upon whom the trials and burdens of the nation must fall, in any event of war or peace. Nonchalance is not necessarily to be characterized as the exact label, unless it could be called indifference.
