Winter Hay, Grazing Crops Needed in East

Recent rains in the Coastal Plain have destroyed the value of a large part of the hay that was stacked outdoors in Eastern Carolina. The damage to peanut and soybean crops has been especially serious, reports E. R. Collins, Extension Agronomy leader of N. C. State College.

legis.

"Every effort should be made by livestock farmers to supplement their feed supplies with fall-seeded crops for winter grazing and spring hay", says Collins. "Fortunately, there is still time to sow winter legumes and small grains to be grazed in February and March, or to be harvested for hay in the late spring."

Farm Engineer Urges Paint For Machinery

Very little new farm machinery will be manufactured for the duration, and D. S. Weaver, Extension agricultural engineer of N. C. State College, says it is absolutely essential that farmers protect and preserve the machinery they now have. Some machines will be irreplaceable, he declared, and failure to protect and preserve them may result in not only an individual, but a National loss.

Farm Engineer Urges Paint For Machinery

"Rust is one of the chief enemies of farm machinery," said Weaver. "Most paints form a protective covering over the metal, but only red lead paint will actually prevent rust."

The farm engineer says that ready-prepared red lead paints are available, and the only caution is to secure a high class product. Cheap paint is a mistake at any time, says Weaver, and particularly at this time.
