BEEKEEPERS TRY SULFA DRUGS

Beekeepers are now resorting to the use of sulfa drugs in their fight against the dreaded American foulbrood, a disease which kills millions of bees in the South each year.

Foulbrood disease, it is claimed, is so pernicious that the only known remedy has been to kill the bees and burn the hive parts -- and even then unless extreme care was used, some diseased material was overlooked and the disease began anew.

Some beekeepers a few months ago got the idea of putting small quantities of sulfathiazole in the feed of the nurse bees, letting them transmit it over to the young larval bees. In this way, the sulfa drug worked its way into their maturing bodies and when the organism attacked them, the drug acted just as it does in the case of human infections.
